See The Wonders Of War Through The Pan-Chro Scope

FEW of us will ever travel to Europe and there, with our own eyes, view the actual scenes of the mightiest conflict in history. But you can see them through the Pan-Chro Scope, which is almost as good. The Pan-Chro Scope is a new invention—something like the stereoscope—fitted with twin-stereo lens of wonderful magnifying power. With this Scope we send you 48 different War Views, taken with the camera. You place the View in the Scope, and immediately you find yourself face to face with an astonishingly life-life scene that resembles a section of a moving-picture film. First you are aboard an American warship—next you are looking into a trench "somewhere in France," then you are among the barbed wire entanglements in "No Man's Land," again you are watching house-to-house fighting in a captured French town, and many other scenes of actual warfare just as interesting and exciting—48 of them in all. The different views take you direct to Belgium, France or wherever the place may be and show you the scenes almost as plainly as though you were there yourself. This Pan-Chro Scope and Views is one of the most wonderful souvenirs of the great war yet produced. Everybody is fascinated with it—men, women, boys and girls alike. We have but a few left—but you can feel sure of getting one if your order is mailed at once.

CLUB OFFER. We will send you this Pan-Chro Scope with 48 all different War Views free and prepaid for three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each. Reward No. 8833.

Wrist Watch

Reward No. 75210

For Men And Boys

For A Club Of Only Ten

THE Wrist Watch is no longer considered effeminate or a "fad." Men and boys in all walks of life now wear them. The millions of American soldiers who went to France—from general down to dough-boy—wore them. It is a practical, common-sense method of carrying a watch.

The watch shown here is the "Leonard"—designed especially for farmers, lumbermen surveyors, miners, campers, hunters, fishermen, etc. It is 6 size, fitted with high-grade American movement, stem wind and pendant set in strong, dust-proof, silver-nickel case with a thick, heavy crystal that cannot easily be broken.

The strap is made of goat skin, of good width, very tough yet pliable and easy on the wrist. It fastens with a nickel-plated buckle which does not come in contact with the skin. This strap may be adjusted to fit the wrist of a small boy or a full-grown man.

This also makes a splendid wrist watch for the women and girls on the farm. It is just what they need when engaged in outdoor work and to wear on motoring trips and on all occasions where it would not be advisable to wear a more expensive watch.

Remember—this watch is fully guaranteed to keep good time. If it fails to do so or proves defective in any way within one year we will either repair or exchange it free of charge. It is yours free on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For ten one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this fine Wrist Watch exactly as described free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 75210.

You Will Laugh, You Will Yell, You Will Scream at "The Blunders of A Bashful Man"

Reward No. 8221

You need this great book! You cannot do without it! For chasing away melancholia, dissipating gloom and banishing trouble you will find it better than all the doctors' "dope" in the world and it has the circus and vaudeville beaten a mile. This great story is the world's champion funny book and you must read it because it eradicates wrinkles, improves the complexion and by its laughter-compelling mirth and irresistible humor rejuvenates your whole body. In this screamingly funny story you follow with rapt attention and hilarious delight the mishaps, mortifications, confusions and agonizing mental and physical distresses of a self-conscious, hypersensitive, appallingly bashful young man who stumbles on through a succession of astounding accidents and ludicrous predicaments that will convulse you with cyclonic laughter causing you to hold both sides for fear of exploding from an excess of uproarious merriment. As a fun maker, rib tickler and laugh-provoker this great story "The Blunders of a Bashful Man" beats all records and you will miss the treat of your life if you don't get it and read it at once.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you a copy of "The Blunders of a Bashful Man" free and prepaid. Reward No. 8221.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Cooling System

MOST everyone is aware that when the engine is in operation intense heat is generated in the cylinders and that some means must be provided for carrying away at least a portion of this heat so to prevent damage to the cylinder walls, pistons, etc. This is accomplished by air on some engines but the more common practice is by water. Surrounding the cylinders are metal jackets through which water is kept in circulation and in this manner a sufficient portion of the heat is carried away. Since the water as it passes through the jackets is considerably raised in temperature, it is necessary to provide means for lowering the temperature of the water as otherwise it would soon raise to the same temperature as the cylinder wall and there would be no cooling effect. The cooling of the water is accomplished by passing it through the radiator. The common construction of the radiator is two tanks, one upper and one lower, which are connected by small tubes which in turn are surrounded by numerous fins or strips of metal. After the water enters the upper tank of the radiator it flows through the small tubes into the lower tank. As water passes through these tubes most of the heat is communicated to the surrounding fins. The fan draws a current of air around these fins and carries off most of the heat. It will be realized that in the manner just described there is considerable lowering in temperature of water after leaving the upper tank and entering the lower tank. The water, being of much lower temperature than the cylinder walls, continues to carry off the heat and in this way proper cooling is obtained. When the thermo-syphon system of cooling is used a larger radiator in comparison to the size of the engine must be used than would be the case if the pump circulation was employed. Larger tubes between the upper and lower tanks are also needed because the water simply gravitates through the tubes. When pump circulation is used smaller tubes are possible as the water is driven instead of just flowing. The action of the tubular radiator has just been described but there is another type known as the cellular. As the name would imply, cells are used instead of tubes and no fins are needed. The fan draws air between these cells and reduces the temperature of the water by carrying away the heat from the walls of the cells.

COOLING SYSTEM WITH TUBULAR RADIATOR.

Up-to-Date Fools

I heard a very learned man remark recently at a dinner that he had that day driven by car from his own city about 40 miles distant and almost had heart failure several times on the trip due to careless driving on the part of other operators. He ended by saying, "At one time fools blew out the gas, now they step on it."

Six-Stroke Cycle Engine

Several times I have received inquiries relative to more efficiency being obtained from the present internal combustion motor if some means were provided for better cleaning the cylinders of the exhaust gases. One or two of these inquiries contained a hint of some idea which the writer was considering bringing out. There is no doubt about more efficiency being gained if all the exhaust gases were swept out of the cylinders, and while I do not know what plans were entertained by the writers, I wish to make clear that engines having a six-stroke cycle have been tried out in an experimental way but have never proven sufficiently satisfactory to warrant their manufacture. This type of engine required six strokes of the piston to complete the work of delivering one power impulse to the crank-shaft. The piston completed the same work as the piston in the four-stroke cycle motor, i. e., suction, compression, explosion and exhaust. In addition, the piston completed two more strokes, one for admitting a charge of fresh air into the cylinder and the other stroke for expelling the air. While it will be readily recognized that this method thoroughly cleaned the cylinders, it must also be taken into consideration that instead of three idle strokes as is now the condition, the six-stroke cycle had five idle strokes. To compensate for such a condition it was necessary to build a large engine, etc. The writer is not aware of all the problems which confronted the engineers in their endeavor to develop this type of engine, but for the benefit of those who were considering the introduction of more strokes to thoroughly clean the cylinders, I submit the above information.

Helpful Pointers

Hard Starting

One of the common causes for hard starting on cars having the roller type timer and vibrating coils is the congealing of the oil on the timer during cold weather. On one popular make of car using this type of timer, lubricant is recommended and in fact is essential to its proper operation. Under certain conditions (cold weather for example) the oil may form a coating between the roller and the contracts. The remedy is to remove the timer cover and wipe the housing and roller with a cloth wrung out of gasolene, the purpose being to cut away the hardened oil film and give good contact.

Frozen Water Pump

If the car is equipped with the pump system of water circulation never turn the motor over if there is any doubt as to whether or not the water is frozen. Should the water be frozen, turning over the engine would probably cause shearing off the key on the pump impeller or gear. Usually a drain cock is placed under the pump and when there is doubt as to the state of the water it is well to open the cock and note whether water runs from same. If the drain cock is clear and no water runs from it when open then the indications are that the pump is frozen and it should be thawed out by pouring hot water over it. When certain that the pump is thawed out it is safe to turn over the engine.

Specific Gravity

The specific gravity of the electrolyte affords one of the best indications of the exact condition of the storage battery. The specific gravity of a liquid is a weight comparison with distilled water. At 60 degreee Fahrenheit distilled water is considered to be 1 and comparisons of liquids are made with distilled water as 1. Any liquid which is heavier than distilled water is said to have a greater specific gravity, while lighter liquids have a lesser specific gravity. The electrolyte in the storage battery is heavier than distilled water and this accounts for the reading of 1.275 of a fully charged cell.

Cold Weather Effect on Battery

Care should be taken during the cold weather to keep the storage battery properly charged. Neglect to heed this suggestion will probably prove expensive to the owner as the electrolyte in the battery will freeze under certain conditions. Should the electrolyte drop to specific gravity 1.120 it will freeze at about 20 degrees above zero. It has been determined that a specific gravity reading of 1.210 causes the electrolyte to freeze at 20 degrees below zero, etc. Unless the garage is heated the battery should be kept well charged. If the battery is stored for the winter it should receive an occasional freshening charge as outlined in a preceding issue.

What Is Electrolyte

Most everyone knows either from experience or advice that electrolyte from the storage battery should not be allowed to come in contact with clothing, due to its eating action on the fabric. Electrolyte is the term given to a mixture of distilled water and pure sulphuric acid. The distilled water is first poured into a glass or porcelain container and the sulphuric acid added in very small quantities. When the acid and water combine a great deal of heat is generated. This is the reason that water is not added to the sulphuric acid as this procedure would cause a dangerous spattering of the acid. The acid should always be added to the water and never the water to the acid.

Cable Sizes

When necessary to replace cables in the electrical circuit be sure to obtain ones of the same size. The size and length of cables must be considered as otherwise they may afford resistance which will affect the efficiency of the system. For example, the starting motor consumes a great deal of current and for this reason large cables are usually sent directly to it from the storage battery. It will also be noted that the cables are usually short ones. It is always best to assume that the manufacturer has determined the proper sizes and lengths to use and, when replacement time comes, endeavor to duplicate the sizes originally installed.

Low Test in One Cell

Should a specific gravity reading be taken of the storage battery and one cell is found to be lower than the others the condition may be due to a cracked jar which has allowed the electrolyte to leak out, an improperly sealed jar which has permitted slopping of the fluid, or worn out insulators causing a short circuit.

Answers to Correspondents

GEARS GRIND IN SECOND.—Please tell me what makes my Overland 4 (1920 model) grind in second gear. Otherwise the car has good power.
MRS. F. P., Livingston, N. Y.

A.—Removal of the transmission cover and examination of the gears should quickly solve your difficulty. If the grinding is only noticeable on second gear then the indications are that the gears do not mesh properly or that the gears are worn and one or both gears need replacing.

GOES JERKY RUNNING SLOWLY IN HIGH.—My 1918 model Ford jumps in running slowly in high gear. It seems as if the magneto turns nearly over before it catches. If the magneto is loose how am I to get at it to tighten it? A. L. B.

A.—I do not understand the condition referred to when you state that the magneto turns nearly over before it catches the engine or wheels. It is my belief that you endeavor to idle down and the engine misses and the action is jerky. It may be possible that the magnets are too far away from the fields for strong, constant current at slow speeds. If you are after absolute smooth operation at slow speeds, you will have to tune up the coils, magnets, valves, carburetor, etc. I do not believe that the magnets are loose but should you desire to get at them will state that the motor must come out of the car and the lower half of the crank-case dropped.

THRUST WASHERS WEAR BADLY.—Please tell me what kind of solder to use for soldering brass and copper especially the Ford radiator. (2) I cannot run my 1919 model Ford more than about two months until I have to put new thrust washers on the rear axle. Please let me know the cause of this trouble. (3) How much horse-power is there in one thousand pounds of air pressure? H. C. M., Pendleton, N. C.

A.—The average solder which you purchase from the store is 50 per cent. tin and 50 per cent. lead. This solder will serve very well for the purpose you outline.

Regarding the wearing out of the thrust washers on the sides of the differential, wish to state that although these parts do wear out, they should last considerably longer than two months. Providing you are not installing inferior parts, I can only assume that something is out of alignment to cause such rapid wear. The axle shaft may be sprung, which would cause sort of a chewing action on these thrust washers. I am certain that the difficulty is not due to material, providing you are using genuine parts and have properly installed them.

Regarding the horse-power question, I will endeavor to explain in an early issue just what horse-power is, and in this way I believe you will gain a better understanding.

PISTON RING CLEARANCE.—What is the proper clearance for piston rings in 1921 model Maxwell car? (2) Would Maxwell rings or any other make of rings be best for my car? W. H. M., Elmira, N. Y.

A.—I do not know what clearance the Maxwell people recommend for the pistons, but as regards the rings you will probably agree that little if any clearance is permissible as they must hold compression. I believe firmly in purchasing genuine parts made by the makers of the car as you thus know that the parts have come up to the manufacturer's requirements.

New Year's Resolutions

THROUGHOUT this bounteous land of ours, in city and country alike, the New Year opens to the accompanying rustle of the "turning over of new leaves." New Year's resolutions are being made in all seriousness and with the very best of intentions, alike by the sinned against and the sinning. For our readers of Modern Farmer, scattered widely as they are throughout the entire country, no set of resolutions we may offer will fit all cases. With the idea that "if the coat fits, put it on," we humbly present, the following assortment, trusting that they will be received in the spirit offered and that some at least will find a welcome which will tend toward the betterment of both the individual and the farm garden—that little quarter-acre patch of land so seldom given the fullness of appreciation it so richly deserves.

Primarily, we are anxious that every farm shall have its supply of vegetables in season, fruits of all kinds that may easily be grown to provide preserves on the shelves for winter use, bins of stored vegetables in the cellar against the time when the snow lies deep and the cold winter winds whistle dolefully under the icicled eaves.

We know full well that often the "head of the house" (or should we call him the boss of the outdoor work, and thereby avoid argument?) is so harrassed with the farm work that he dislikes to spend even a day in preparation of the kitchen garden. He honestly believes that he can't spare the time. It seems to him as if he would rather spend many dollars for the purchase of fruits and vegetables, from neighbors or from the city market, than bother with the "puttering" work of garden making. Right there lies the danger, for the sad fact remains that these promised fruits and vegetables are not bought. Too often the household goes without the crisp vegetables and luscious fruits to its own digestive detriment, and to the impairment of the winter's larder in the shape of well-stocked preserve shelves and root cellars.

To our way of thinking this is all wrong; these fruits and vegetables can be produced right at home, and no one is better entitled to them than the owner and operator of the farm. It does take time and skill to garden successfully, and the farmer who is so taken up with the operation of the farm that he "can't be bothered with so insignificant a matter as the kitchen garden" should wipe prejudice from his eyes and look again. Why, the garden returns the biggest income over time, labor and expense of any land on the farm—if it is given a square deal! Figured at the market cost, not selling price, of the things the little quarter-acre patch will produce if well handled, it is safe to put the return somewhere between $100 and $150, using census figures obtained by the U. S. Department of Agriculture as our authority. Do such figures make it seem more worth while? Think the matter over.

Now for the resolutions: Let each farmer raise his right hand and say: "I hereby resolve to do all in my power to improve the kitchen garden on my farm, realizing that it is worth while in dollars and cents; that I will never again consider the garden and its care as belonging entirely to the women folks, but will lend a hand with the heavy work of fertilizing, plowing and crop cultivating and harvesting; that I will see that all tools are repaired, replaced or purchased so that work may progress without interruption; that the surrounding fence will be rebuilt if necessary so that the hens will not become a nuisance and a source of damage; and that I will take an active interest in the selection of garden seeds at an early date from a reputable seed house, such as those which advertise in COMFORT, thus assuring high germination, trueness to type and variety, purity, vitality and desirability, thus assuring successful gardening.

Preventing Apple Scald

People who sleep in unventilated rooms often wonder why they catch cold "when there wasn't a least bit of draft." The truth is that they are poisoning themselves in the gases exhaled in their own breath, their vitality is lessened and their resistance to germ diseases of all kinds is undermined. Fresh air is the secret of health, nor can the human body perform up to its full efficiency if it is denied a free circulation of air during the night as well as the day.

But it had not occurred to fruit raisers that the same underlying cause was to blame for the spoiling of apples in storage until scientists of the Department of Agriculture investigated and found that losses due to apple scald could be greatly reduced or entirely prevented by ventilating storage cellars and cold-storage rooms. In fact, this disease, which becomes apparent in stored apples when the skin turns brown, is caused by gases which are "breathed" out by the apples themselves.

Experiments proved that when apples were wrapped in paper impregnated with certain fats or oils that absorb the gases, the loss was either prevented or greatly reduced. Ordinary paraffin wrappers had little or no preventive value, however. It was also found that mature fruit scalds less than immature, but that fruit just changing from green to yellow scalded even worse than the fully ripe or the very green. Well-colored red fruit was found to be practically immune, but apples from irrigated regions scalded worse than those from unirrigated orchards. Ventilated barrels showed much less scald than unventilated barrels or boxes, provided the room was ventilated, the difference ranging from 20 to 30 per cent. in favor of ventilated barrels. Apples near aisles and doors spoiled less than those placed close to walls and in corners where fresh air could not easily reach. Perhaps the most important discovery, however, was that agitation of air in the storage room was even more effective than renewing air by opening windows or bringing in outside air in other ways. When fans were so arranged as to keep the same air constantly in motion at all times, losses of stored apples were negligible.

Boys' and Girls' Clubs

Of all the worthy movements started within recent years, perhaps none has made such remarkable growth and to such fine purpose as farm boys' and girls' clubs. From a small beginning some ten years ago under the fostering guidance of the Department of Agriculture, club work has far exceeded the fondest hopes of its most ardent supporters. The underlying idea when clubs were first formed was that the enlightenment of young life on the farms might materially affect farm practices and create a growing and valuable interest in farm life. Today we find farm boys' and girls' clubs in almost every state and district of the United States with a total membership of some 500,000, and evidence is ever at hand to show that the movement has been productive of results measurable in dollars and cents, improved farm practices, increased interest in farming on the part of the growing generation, and no doubt a greater inclination to remain on the farm.

A generation or two ago the secrets underlying crop culture, field management, feedlot methods —the many details of diversified farming—were hardly realized and hazily understood. The growing youth had little or no idea of just what the farm offered in the form of a future life work. But now, through club work, boy and girl members acquire information and display initiative which is a never-ending source of joy and surprise to their elders.

Boy and girl club workers of today are business men and women in the making. Clubs elect their own officers and at the regular meetings all matters of importance are discussed and handled in a strictly businesslike manner. To hear such topics as the proper rations for hogs, sheep and cattle, methods of canning fruits and vegetables, care of baby chicks, crop rotation and farm accounting, and any number of other worthy subjects all discussed and debated by "youngsters" hardly well started in their 'teens, is something to gladden the hearts of fond parents anywhere.

In a census taken at the International Live Stock Exposition in Chicago, it was found that the combined wealth of the 253 club members who attended was $300,000, the entire sum of which had been earned through club work of some sort. That boys and girls who grow to early manhood and womanhood as club members are interested in acquiring a good education is proved by the fact that in one year 1,800 of them entered colleges or universities to take courses in agriculture or home economics—courses designed to better equip them for work in the country.

Are we over-optimistic in feeling that the future rural life will be brightened and bettered by their activity? We think not. Equipped with facts about the farm and the farm home and problems that it has not been the privilege of their parents to study and solve, club members of today are destined to be a great force for good in community life and upbuilding of the future. Lessons learned first in the clubs, later in schools and colleges, are a safe foundation upon which to build men and women of intelligence and strong character—future leaders in agriculture, the world's greatest industry.

Why Use Purebred Sires?

When purebred sires are used to improve farm livestock the offspring is more salable than that of scrub, grade or crossbred sires and brings nearly 50 per cent. greater returns. This percentage was brought out by the answers received to a questionnaire sent out by the Department of Agriculture to several hundred farmers living in all parts of the country. It also showed conclusively that purebred livestock in general has about 40 per cent. greater earning power than scrub stock, apart from its breeding or sale value. The improvement is most readily noticeable in dairy cattle and poultry, probably because it is easier to measure their production than the production of other kinds of farm animals.

But have you ever considered this side of the matter? The use of the purbred sire has a desirable psychological effect. Boys may well leave a poorly equipped farm populated with scrub stock, but they will be anxious to remain on a farm where purebred, attractive animals are kept at a profit—to be handed down to posterity as a nucleus around which future success may be built. The environment grows to be in good keeping with the good quality of the livestock found upon the farm. The farmer himself becomes a better citizen and a better business man. Because of his success and foresight he is respected and looked to as a leader in his community. His enlightenment is reflected in the modern conveniences about the home and farm, better social and family life, and better education for his children. Purebred stock has paid his mortgage, put money in the bank, and returned to him his self-respect, and he is willing to give it credit for having done so.

If purebreds did nothing more than help keep farm boys and girls on the farm it would pay its own way, but it does far more than that. It returns profits where scrub stock is a loss producing liability.

Milk Facts

Gradually we are awakening to the true value of milk as a food, but "better late than never." We have long known that milk is a perfect food for the very young; now we are coming to realize that it is a valuable supplement to the ordinary diet of adults, also. It is not a beverage like tea or coffee; it carries important food constituents. The energy contained in a quart of milk is about equal to a pound of lean steak or to eight eggs. Whether it is used in the form of whole milk, skimmed milk, buttermilk or cheese, milk furnishes a protein which seems to be just what the body needs.

Milk makes good the mineral deficiencies in the ordinary diet. Grains and potatoes are notoriously poor in their content of chlorine, calcium and sodium; milk makes up for this shortage. It also is rich in vitamines, those newly discovered health-producing and growth-promoting substances indispensable to life. These things fully understood, milk should therefore be used more liberally both as a drink and in cookery.

Here is an illustration of the hold milk drinking is gaining in the cities, not for undernourished school children where it has long been employed with fine results, but for adults. At the Chicago headquarters of Montgomery, Ward & Co., milk is purchased by the company and served at the rate of one glassful twice a day to each of the 7,000 employees. Is it not likely that a business concern of this size knows that it is getting value received for the money thus spent?

The English Broad Bean

A highly welcome new addition, known as the English broad or Windsor bean, has recently been made to the list of garden beans available for planting in the cooler northern portion of this country. It is particularly well suited to regions where the season is usually late, cool and rainy during the planting season, with hot and dry weather following about the time the young plants get a good start. Such conditions prevail in the states bordering on the Great Lakes and the upper Atlantic seaboard, and here the broad bean has been

The Care of Eggs for Hatching

OF course there is no longer any question about the advisability of using an incubator to do the hatching, if one desires to achieve success with poultry. Hens cannot be relied upon to set early in the season, and it is the early hatched chick which develops into the early laying pullet and the early broiler or fryer. Every one knows that eggs in the early winter bring the highest price, and that the price of young table birds is higher in May and June than at any other season. There really is not as much time or trouble in running an incubator as there is in looking after ten hens who are setting, and at the very best, could only hatch out one hundred and thirty chicks, while an incubator holding three hundred eggs, at the very least estimate, would give one hundred and fifty chicks, and an ordinary hatch would produce two hundred and twenty-five; and that just when they are most valuable, instead of having to wait for old hens to get broody. Many of our readers write to me each year about poor hatches that they have had in incubators. Even at the cost of being considered unkind, I must say that in most cases they are to blame, not the incubators. The modern incubator is a wonderfully simple machine, and works almost automatically, but it has its limitations. First of all, it is inanimate, and can't cackle or make a noise when left without oil or sufficient ventilation, as any old biddy can, and does if she is not supplied with feed and water at regular intervals. Then another point in which the incubator is even more often badly treated, is the quality and age of the eggs intrusted to it to hatch. On a farm, there are seldom more than two or three hens wanting to hatch at the same time, therefore the eggs given to them are only from five to twenty-four hours old, whereas in the case of an incubator, they are often as many days old, because few farm flocks are laying very heavily in February and March, so eggs have to be saved and held over until enough can be collected to fill a machine, and even the smallest incubators take about sixty eggs. Now, keeping eggs for two or even three weeks does not matter at all if they are kept in the right way, and carefully selected. But, as a matter of fact, not half the eggs put into a machine on a farm are in a condition to hatch. Professional poultry keepers know the importance of mating, feeding, and care of the egg before it is put into a machine or under a hen; the amateur, as a rule, ignores all these points, and then blames the incubator for a poor hatch.

Mating and feeding of breeding stock we have gone into pretty fully in the fall numbers of COMFORT, so we will now take up the matter of keeping and selecting eggs. First of all, as many diseases are transmitted through the medium of the egg, it is important that the breeding stock should be in good health. Second, there must be a sufficient number of male birds running with the hens for ten days before the eggs are to be saved for hatching. Nests must be cleaned, and the nesting material fresh. Old musty hay or other such material is sure to be infested with spores which cling to the shell of eggs and inoculate the chicks with disease germs even before they are hatched.

THE SIZE OF AIR CELL AT DIFFERENT PERIODS OF INCUBATION. 1. THE FRESH EGG SEVEN DAYS AFTER INCUBATION STARTS, 14 DAYS LATER, THE 19TH DAY.

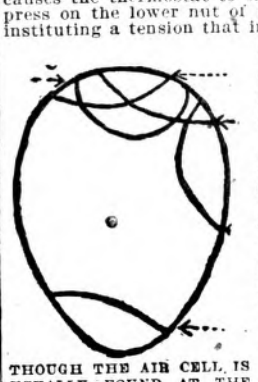
Fourth, eggs must be collected several times a day in cold weather to prevent them being chilled. Fifth, eggs must be kept in an even temperature of about 65 degrees, and placed in wire trays or shallow boxes filled with bran. They should be placed small end down, and turned over every day if kept more than forty-eight hours. And last, before filling the incubator, the eggs should be carefully sorted and tested.

While testing of incubation eggs generally refers to tests made on the seventh and 14th days, it is well also to make a pre-incubation test. The candling is done in a small, dark room, or in the cellar, where eggs are quickly placed before a shaded light and the inferior ones removed. In the pre-incubation test there should be removed (1) any eggs with weak or defective shells, such as those containing blind chicks, (2) any eggs with bloody yolks, or albumen, or interiors abnormal in appearance, indicating bacterial infection, (3) or any eggs with abnormally darkened yolks or enlarged air cells indicating too much age or improper care since being laid. Many poor hatches would be prevented if the eggs going into the incubator were more critically scrutinized and the poor ones eliminated. If eggs found to be in the above classes are incubated they should be plainly marked or recorded and their condition noted at the final judgment day (twenty-first day).

What is known as the first test during incubation is usually performed on the fifth or sixth day for white eggs, and on the seventh or eighth day for brown eggs. The reasons for testing the eggs at the end of the first week are as follows: (1) to know the degree of the fertility of the breeders at the earliest date possible, especially in the early part of the incubation season. Perhaps changes in males will be necessary, and a week or two is invaluable at this season; (2) to remove the infertile eggs, which, if carefully tested, have a relatively low market value when sold for household or bakery cooking; (3) to remove blood rings and other forms of dead germs, that the contents of the egg may not deteriorate and cause bad odors to be given off in the incubator; (4) if infertiles and dead germs are removed early it not only makes the turning of the eggs more easy, but prevents an unrepresentative temperature being indicated by a contact thermometer which would be influenced by the cooler eggs.

With a little practice one can easily recognize the infertile eggs since the interior appears perfectly clear when placed before the candle. The dead germs appear as a lifeless mass sometimes floating and sometimes stuck to the shell membranes. Other dead germs appear as blood rings, in some the dead mass appearing in the center of the ring and in others showing only the blood ring, as the germs died very early. The live germs appear as large spiders with blood red bodies. The body part is the developing germ and multiplicity of legs in the circulation system, gathering food and oxygen for the embryo chick.

The second test is made about the fourteenth day. At this time any germs that have died since the seventh day test should be removed. These may be recognized by the absence of visible blood vessels and interlining pink membranes, by the smallness of the germ, and by the general sick appearance of the contents in contrast with the healthy appearance of a live germ. A well-developed germ will also cause the larger portion of the egg to appear more opaque.



our special needs, it is well to send for it as quickly as possible, as there is always a great rush for machines early in the spring, and unless your order is in early, you may have to wait some time. The next point is to decide where you are going to locate the machine when it arrives. The cellar is the best place, because the temperature varies there less than in any other part of the house; but if for any reason the cellar is not available, a room on the north side of the house is the next best place.

Most of the modern wooden machines are sent out in a half knockdown condition, to lessen the freight expense, and also because they can be packed more securely. The firms send printed instructions for setting up and running, also the necessary screws for attaching the fixtures, but they don't emphasize all the important points quite strongly enough for amateurs. For instance, most people can't drive a screw home accurately, and fail to realize that if the head is slightly to the right or left, it throws the fixture which is being attached to the machine out of plumb, and when lamps and regulating apparatus are concerned, that is disastrous, if not fatal. I suffered rather heavily through neglect of this point, and for that reason warn others. It is so easy to get some handy man or boy to help you, and it may save a lot of trouble and disappointment. Next, the machine must stand perfectly level, or the heat will not be distributed evenly throughout the egg chamber; so it is well to borrow a carpenter's spirit level, instead of trusting to appearances.

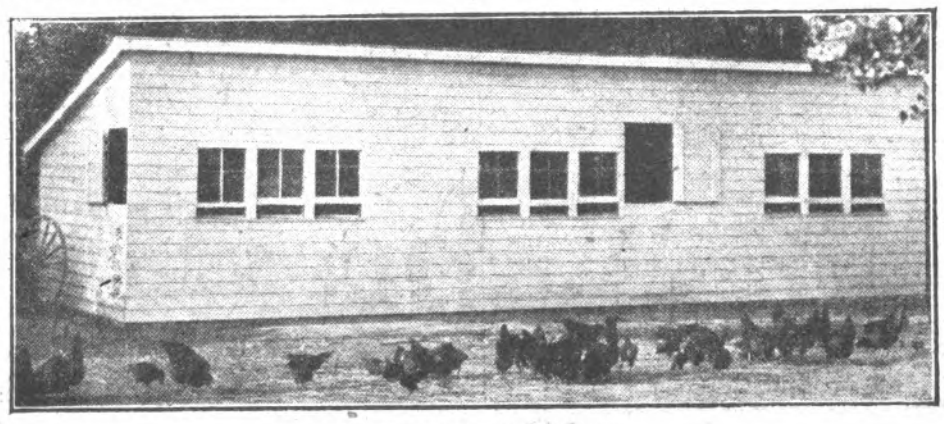
But it is not until it comes to adjusting the thermometer that goes inside of the machine to the regulating arm that fits into the pivot at the top of the machine that extreme accuracy is necessary. There is a wire connecting rod which runs through and connects, and on whose nicety of responsiveness to pressure depends the self-regulating possibilities of the modern incubator. Unless its passage through the several attachments is uniformly even and free from friction, the value of the thermometer is lost. This will be obvious when the method of controlling heat is understood.

The thermostat is composed of a combination of such metals as aluminum and steel. Being extremely sensitive to heat, it expands and contracts to every fluctuation of heat within the incubator. The regulator arm has a counterbalance ball at one end and a metal disk at the other, and when it rests on the pivot which is fixed at the top of the machine, the disk should be suspended directly over the lamp chimney. The connecting rod has two nuts at the top, and one at the lower end; the latter is removed entirely, and the former loosened to the extremity of the rod before it is run through the regulator arm and pivot on the exterior, and through the hot air space and thermostat in the interior of the machine, at which point the lower nut is replaced and screwed up to hold the thermostat closely against the burlap ceiling to the chamber.

After the lamp is lighted and the machine heated to 102½ degrees, the top or regulating nut on the connecting rod, immediately above the regulator arm, is screwed until the disk is raised one-fourth of an inch above the chimney—such an adjustment being considered by manufacturers and expert operators as being the most desirable for incubation. The machine once being "set" for this degree of temperature, any excess of heat causes the thermostat to expand, which makes it press on the lower nut of the connecting rod, so instituting a tension that influences the regulator arm at the point of balance, raising the disk over the lamp chimney in sympathetic conjunction with the thermostat.

THOUGH THE AIR CELL IS USUALLY FOUND AT THE LARGE END OF THE EGG IT MAY OCCASIONALLY BE FOUND IN ANY ONE OF THE POSITIONS SHOWN ABOVE.

Reverse the conditions to a dying lamp or a sudden cold wave, and of course the thermostat contracts, and general release of pressure allows the regulator arm to resume a normal balance, which permits the disk to lie closely down on the chimney. It will be readily conceded that on a correct adjustment of the machine before starting depends the operator's peace of mind and subsequent success.



The incubator being properly located, fill the lamp, light and hang in place, using only a moderate flame at first. Leave all the ventilators open for a few hours, to thoroughly air the machine; then close and adjust the regulator so that an even temperature of 102½ degrees, with a disk one-fourth of an inch above the lamp chimney, is steadily maintained for twelve hours before setting the eggs. Patience and scrupulous exactness at first will save accident and loss later.

The main points to remember in running an incubator are: First, temperature. The best temperature is known to be from 102 to 103 degrees on the fertile egg. A great variation from this, either high or low, not only reduces the number of chicks hatched, but reduces the vigor and fertility of those which get out of the shell. A high temperature running continuously throughout the hatch results in an early hatch, and is apt to be accompanied by weak youngsters, while a low temperature results in a prolonged hatch and poor results. An ideal hatch is one which, due to uniform temperature, starts on or about the twentieth or twenty-first day, and is completely over within from twelve to twenty-four hours.

A second factor, of equal importance in the management of the incubation, should be the supplying of fresh air. The growing embryo needs a full supply of oxygen, without which the embryo cannot grow normally. This oxygen can best be supplied to the egg by causing fresh, pure air to flow into the machine and into the air chamber. This ventilation, as it is called, must take place continuously, but without any rapid movement would cause a too rapid evaporation of the egg content.

Another consideration of equal or greater importance is the necessity of maintaining the moisture at such a point that excessive evaporation will be prevented. If, due to dry atmospheric conditions, evaporation takes place rapidly, much of the contents of the egg, which otherwise would go into the chick, is given off into the air, and the result is undersized chickens at hatching time. The big, heavy, fluffy youngsters can only be produced where a fairly high humidity is contained

A WELL-PLANNED CHICKEN-HOUSE.

A third test on the eighteenth day is advisable if one intends to pedigree hatch, as this will save, especially in the early season, extra labor on chicks that will only remain in the shells. With brown eggs it is more difficult to distinguish the dead germs, especially if the previous tests have been properly done. Usually, however, there will be, especially with weak, or late dead germs, an area of membranes near the air cell which is not covered with the shadow of the embryo. If such an area is seen, one can readily tell whether or not life exists, by the presence of blood vessels in the area. Generally the darker in appearance on the eighteenth day and the more completely the egg is filled to the air cell, resulting in opaque appearance, the stronger and better the embryo. In case of doubt the egg should always be retained.

After selecting the egg, of course, comes the incubator which is to do the hatching. Having decided on the size of the machine best adapted to

A New Discovery Makes Hens Lay

Any poultry raiser can easily and quickly double his profits by doubling his egg yield through the remarkable discovery of M. B. Smith, a Kansas City chemist.

Working along entirely original lines, Mr. Smith discovered why hens lay less in winter than in summer and perfected a formula that turns loafers into layers and profit makers.

Within five or six days this discovery, which is called Ditto Egg Tablets, will rejuvenate your flock. Your hens will go strutting and cackling about with red combs and full of life and pep. Every nest will yield an egg nearly every day in the week, which means a lot, since eggs are certain to sell for 60 cents or more. This is not guess work as over 100,000 successful poultry raisers testify to the value of Mr. Smith's products.

Although different from anything you ever heard of, Ditto Egg Tablets are easily administered by simply dropping in drinking water.

So confident is Mr. Smith you can double or triple your egg yield, that he offers to send two large $1 packages of Ditto Egg Tablets (enough for a season) to any reader who will write for them. If you are satisfied they cost only $1 on this introductory offer, otherwise, nothing.

Send No Money—just your name and address to M. B. Smith, 1269 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. The two $1 packages will be mailed immediately. When they arrive, pay the postman only $1 and postage. Use the tablets 10 days. If you are not getting more eggs or are not satisfied for any reason, simply return unused tablets and your money will be returned immediately without question. A big Kansas City bank guarantees the reliability of this offer. Write today before this introductory offer is withdrawn, as you can sell one package to a friend and thus get your own free.

grown on a small scale for some years, but only during the past season or two has it come into prominence due to several reasons which recommend it highly as a garden crop. In southeastern Canada it has been largely grown for many years, succeeding well in the gardens of English and Scotch farmers whose ancestors no doubt brought over from the "old country" both the beans and the taste for the crop, for the British housewife makes good use of the broad beans in soups and many other ways.

The broad bean resembles the Lima in size, shape and general appearance; it may also be cooked in the same way, served as a side dish with melted butter, or included in vegetable soup where it gives both flavor and body. This bean is the hardiest member of the bean family, growing where Limas do not flourish either due to short or cool weather. The plants grow as bushes about three feet in height, seem to do well on either sandy or clay soil, survive late springs with excess rainfall, but also resist considerable summer drought.

Value of Green Manuring

Green manuring is an old farm practice that is coming to be more fully appreciated and understood. By green manuring we mean the turning under of any crop, either while still green or shortly after ripening, for the purpose of soil improvement. With the single exception of dry farming in semi-arid regions, where moisture is too scarce to quickly rot the turned-under crop, green manuring can be employed to advantage throughout the country. Particularly is this true in irrigated sections where both orchards and truck gardens show increased production after green crops have been turned under.

When a green manure crop is plowed under, the various fertilizing elements that have contributed to its growth are returned to the soil, and a quantity of organic matter not formerly present in the soil is added. The physical condition or tilth of the soil is also improved. One of the most important functions of organic matter in the soil is to keep up the nitrogen supply; this is brought about by the action of nodule bacteria upon the roots of legume crops, and also by other soil bacteria and molds which feed upon plant waste in the soil itself.

Legumes are the most satisfactory crop for green manuring under most conditions, with alfalfa, vetches, field and garden peas, soy and velvet beans, and the various clovers—red, white, crimson, alsike, sweet and bur—from which to choose.

The question often arises whether a crop should be turned under for green manure, fed on the farm, or sold for hay. When a forage crop can be grazed to advantage and the manure returned to the land, this will be found most profitable. Where insufficient livestock is kept, or where the soil is poor and in need of organic matter, a green crop may often be worth more if turned under. It is an established fact that the turning under of a green crop increases the yields of subsequent crops for at least two and sometimes three years.

High Yielding Cows Most Profitable

Cows that produce milk and butterfat in large quantities consume large amounts of feed, and sometimes we wonder if they are producing in proportion to the amounts they eat. A study of the records of 96 cow testing associations located in various parts of the country show that they do, and that those with the keen appetites and the roomy paunches bring in higher incomes over feed cost than do the scanty producers, regardless of breed, age, weight, date of freshening and the region in which they are kept.

According to figures based on 18,014 yearly individual cow records, as butterfat production increased from 100 to 400 there was a regular increase of about $16 in income over feed cost per cow for every 50 pounds of increase in average production of butterfat. As the yield of butterfat increased from 109 to 396 pounds, the returns above the dollar expended for feed increased from 35 cents to $1.52.

The cows having an average milk production of 3,250 pounds showed an average income of $42.25 over cost of feed, while those producing 13,250 showed an average income of $218.19 over feed cost. The cows in the latter group produced about four times as much as those in the other group, and their average income over cost of feed was nearly seven times as great. The increase in income above feed cost grew regularly with the increase in production. These records show that it pays well to put feed into the big producers, even though they are big eaters, for they certainly turn the excess of feed to good use—and into dairy dollars.

Silos Have Great Value

Dairymen, and cattle feeders everywhere for that matter, have learned that the silo combines more good things and brings greater profits than any other building on the farm. Even in regions where corn cannot be matured, and where other crops such as sunflowers, peas and oats mixed, or even legumes must be utilized, the silo is making strong friends. Still we find some farmers who refuse to "see the light" and build a silo, believing that silage "sours the cows' stomachs," but it is surprising how many of these men are changing their views. Dollars talk, and they see their neighbors making more money with their silos; finally they, too, fall in line.

Here are some of the reasons why silos have come to stay: They provide a cheap and convenient place in which to store the corn crop; help utilize cheap roughage; make it possible to keep more stock on the farm, which means more manure for the land, better crops and bigger profits; insure a supply of succulent feed throughout the winter and during dry spells when pastures fail; provide a balanced ration when fed with alfalfa, clover, bran, cottonseed meal and other protein feeds. Furthermore, the silo provides a means of saving corn that has been frosted. It also takes care of the crop and clears the land for early fall plowing, prevents waste in feeding, keeps stock in good condition, and makes cheaper milk or beef.

Always Dry Your Milk Cans

Because bacteria increase in numbers at such a rapid rate when conditions are favorable, it is necessary not only to kill as many of them as possible by sterilizing in order to keep dairy utensils clean and insure a good product, but utensils must be dried and kept dry so that the organisms which escape death after sterilization will not multiply rapidly. In addition to the proper temperature it is necessary that moisture be present for these germs to grow, but only a very thin film of water is needed to make growth possible. For this reason it is particularly important that all cans be thoroughly dried then kept dry when not in use. In addition, they must be protected from contamination with dust, dirt and flies.

To secure rapid drying the cans must be sterilized with steam or boiling water. If a sterilizer is used the cans may be left in it until time for them to be used again, but there must be some means of ventilation to carry off the moisture. Cans may be set on a rack to dry, but they should be protected from flies and dust, preferably by a well screened milk house.

Experiments conducted by the Department of Agriculture show that in milk cans which were covered before being dried the number of bacteria increased 700 times in 24 hours! Milk put into cans in which the bacteria have been permitted to multiply to such an extent will spoil many hours sooner than milk put into cans that were thoroughly dry before being covered. Where the work of drying, a small item in itself, brings such marked improvement in the keeping quality of milk or cream, it is well worth while to pay a little more attention to this matter on all farms where dairy products are handled.

Choosing the Herd Boar

"Select a boar that is at least nine months old" is the best bit of advice we can give. The common practice of buying a weanling pig, with the hope that he will develop into the right sort of breeding animal, is at best a "gamble." Such a pig, no matter how well bred, may develop serious faults or defects before maturity. A boar of nine months is serviceable for light breeding, but should not be much used before he is from twelve to eighteen months old. From then on he is in his prime, and it is foolish to retire a boar that has proved conclusively his prepotency and his ability to get pigs of the desired type just because he is getting old.

In selecting a boar look for strong proofs of masculinity. This is indicated by a strong head; thick, well-crested neck; well-developed, muscular shoulders; stiff bristles and hair that is inclined to be coarser than is found in sows of the same breed. The visible reproductive organs should be well developed, and the young boar with an undescended testicle avoided, as the chances are that he may prove to be either sterile or an uncertain breeder. He should be strongly possessed of meat making qualities, and must have the constitution, vigor and vitality coupled with the activity necessary to get strong, healthy pigs. Quality should not be considered unless combined with size and scale, for the small and over-refined boar is often deficient in masculinity and certainly lacks the ability to transmit good size to his progeny. Strong bone in the feet and legs is important, as the small-boned, weak-tendoned boar will be almost certain to "go over in the pasterns" or "break down" as he increases in weight and age. Select a young boar that "stands well up on his toes" and that has strong, straight legs.

Questions and Answers

YELLOW OR WHITE CORN, WHICH?—For years we have raised mostly white corn down here and fed it to our hogs and other stock. Now I hear that yellow corn is a better feed than the white. Is this true, and if so what is the reason? Miss J. T., Mississippi.

ANS.—Scientists have recently proved that yellow corn is a far better feed, especially for pigs under 100 pounds, than is white corn. But when hogs are given free access to green pastures and to legume hay the difference is only slight. The reason for this is that yellow corn is rich in a substance called "vitamine" which produces thrift, normal growth and good health, but white corn is deficient in this same food substance. We know of a case where 60-pound pigs, fed a ration of white corn and skim-milk, developed rickets or what hog men call paralysis or rheumatism. Some of them died. Others quickly recovered when yellow corn was substituted for the white in the ration. When pigs are permitted to graze on succulent green feed, however, the shortage of vitamine seems to be overcome. Therefore, when it is possible to do so, it is best to feed yellow corn to pigs, and for good measure give them access to growing crops as well.

SIPHONING WATER FROM WELL.—I have a spring-fed well situated some 200 feet up a rather steep hillside from my house. Long ago water was carried from this well to the house in pails, but this was a lot of work, so a well was dug in the yard. The newer arrangement is more convenient, but the water is not nearly so good, and the flow is much less. I have often wondered if some kind of a siphon could not be rigged up to pipe the good water from the old well. Water stands in this well about 25 feet from the ground surface, and there is a fall of at least 50 feet to the house. Could such a siphon be arranged to work; if so, how could it be started? E. M. McC., New York.

A.—There is no reason why a siphon could not be installed to bring water down hill from the old well and made to work satisfactorily, as you have a sufficient fall and the lift is not too great if the well water remains no further than 25 feet from the surface when being used. If the level is likely to drop, perhaps it might be best to dig a ditch four or five feet deep up at the well, thus reducing the lift. In fitting the pipe sections together, be sure they make airtight joints to keep out air. Even then air will gradually accumulate in the apex or high point of the curve of the pipe and cut off the water flow. To start water flowing, and to get rid of air and start it over again when that is necessary, an ordinary cistern pump must be connected near the outlet. This will exert sufficient suction to start the flow, when it will run out of a faucet freely.

TO MAKE HOUSE PLANTS BLOOM.—Please tell me if there is anything that will keep house plants green, thrifty, and blooming during the winter months. I have a house plant that buds, but just as the buds are about to open they fall off.

MRS. A. A., Clinton, Maine.

A.—Very likely your house plants bud but fail to bloom because they are potted in the fall and brought into the warm indoor temperature suddenly. The sudden change stimulates leafy growth, but greatly interferes with proper and profuse blooming. If house plants such as geraniums for instance, are to be kept in the house over winter, follow this plan: In early fall cut the plants back to two or three strong healthy shoots, transplant into small pots giving only sufficient room for the roots without any great amount of soil, then set the pot back into the ground. Leave plants thus until danger of frost is threatening. Take plants into some comparatively cool place, such as the cellar, and set them where they will get some light, but not direct warm sunlight. Leave them here until about Thanksgiving then bring them up-stairs, setting them first in a cool place such as a north window, then moving them along toward Christmas into a warm place in the sunlight. Here they will soon make buds and bloom profusely throughout the remainder of the winter.

SUBSTITUTE FOR PUMPKIN.—At present I am feeding my cows, as a regular ration, corn stover, hay, a complete dairy feed and an amount of home-ground chops of oats and rye mixed. In addition to this each cow gets one bushel of pumpkins. Since feeding the pumpkins the milk and butter fat have increased wonderfully, but as my supply of pumpkins is about out I would like to have you suggest something to take their place. J. R., Fairview, Pa.

A.—To suggest something to take the place of pumpkins in your ration is easy for us, but no doubt would be difficult for you to follow at this season of the year. That dairy cows need succulence is fully proved by the increase in production resulting from feeding pumpkins. Silage is the best and cheapest succulent feed; root crops are second. It is too late to grow either this year, but not too late to plan on next year's feeding needs. If silage or roots cannot be bought at a reasonable figure in your locality, about your only alternative is to supply either clover or alfalfa hay in quantity. Also feed wheat bran mash including oil meal and a little molasses. Give cows free access to salt at all times, and all the fresh drinking water they will drink. And next year build a silo by all means.

PREVENTING TREE BORERS.—Please tell how to rid trees of boreworms also what to do to prevent the worms from boring into other trees. They are boring into my Norway maples and cork-bark elm. After the borers get to work in a tree it rots away.

F. W. D., Nampa, Idaho.

A.—In general we are almost helpless against boring larvæ once they get into the trunks of trees. About all that can be done is to cut out and burn the worst trees or branches, then strive to prevent further spread to sound trees. Thorough whitewashing offers a large measure of protection if thoroughly and frequently performed during the early spring months, as the adult insects will not voluntarily eat through a coat of it to deposit their eggs and the newly-hatched larvæ cannot penetrate through it into the tree when they are first hatched. Whitewash, preferably containing some glue or salt to make it stick better, may be applied with any power spraying outfit to the trunk and all larger branches. For safety renew it every two weeks until the middle of July. A strong fish oil soap spray, made with one pound of soap to the gallon of water, is also widely and successfully used instead of the whitewash which we have advised. The addition of crude carbolic acid at the rate of one ounce to the gallon of suds makes an even more effective repellent mixture, but it should never be sprayed upon the leaves or small tender twigs. Orchard trees may be protected by having wire netting or tarred paper wrapped around the trunks, but for larger trees such as maples or elm this method would hardly serve. As the sprays we have outlined are really preventive or repellent rather than destructive to either the larvæ or adult borers, success will be measured in proportion to the thoroughness and persistence with which the work is performed. From our own experience we know that the one way to get the upper hand over borers is to "keep everlastingly at 'em."

HAPPY New Year, girls! It doesn't seem possible that twelve months have passed since I said it last time, does it? but that's because we have been busy, and more and more every day I realize the blessedness of work. It's the best little panacea for trouble and temptation that I know of,—not that I'm troubled much with either. Bear in mind that somebody, Ben Franklin, I think it was, said, "Whatever is worth doing is worth doing well." I know another one, sort of an amendment to that: "The successful worker is one who can do what he ought to do when he ought to do it, whether he wants to do it or not." I don't believe I am a successful worker.

MRS. P., Pennsylvania.—A gossiping woman does more harm in a community than a settlement of fat, healthy typhoid germs. You can fight against the germs and inoculate people against typhoid but no one has yet discovered an inoculation against gossip. George Eliot said, "As to people saying a few idle words about us, we must not mind that, any more than the old church steeple minds the rooks cawing about it," but, unfortunately, not all of us can feel that way. I feel rather as she did, even though I haven't the courage she displayed. In your case, a snappy letter from your lawyer to the gossiping woman might put the fear of the law, at least, into her heart and stop further gossip about your family. Do not write a threatening letter yourself, under any circumstances. If I weren't such a law-abiding citizen myself I'd be in favor of a nice sticky coat of tar, decorated with feathers (very fashionable this year, the feathers, I mean) for malicious gossips, but that isn't right and, besides, there probably wouldn't be feathers enough to go around if all gossips were treated that way. That's how I like 'em.

C. G., Texas.—There seems no reason why you shouldn't wave to a friend when he is too far away to speak to you. Texas has always impressed me as being a friendly state. If you felt sure he wanted to talk with you it was perfectly permissible to wait for him.

MRS. C., Indiana.—It is unfortunate that your husband wasn't more choice of his women associates when he first came to town but don't let that fact or them worry you now. Doubtless he could have married any one of these girls if he had wanted to, but he wanted you instead. Believe in him and trust him and don't be afraid to let him know it. As for their speaking to him, they'll gradually cease when they find it doesn't bother you. Of course you could move away from the town where you are living so that he wouldn't meet these girls, but if there is a doubt in your mind you won't be able to move away from that. If your husband is so weak that he can't withstand temptation he will be tempted just as quickly in a new town, more quickly perhaps for there would be new temptations and if there is anything a man likes better than himself it is a new temptation.

O. W., North Carolina.—It is impossible for me to say whether he loves you or not. I don't believe he knows himself. However, if I were in your place I'd reason thusly: "If I am not necessary to his happiness then he isn't necessary to mine," and act accordingly. Don't give up any good times because he isn't there. It is rather difficult for me to advise you as to work. You see, I don't know whether H——— has one store or twenty. I do advise you, though, to go on with your studies if at all possible. You aren't too old to go to school but if that is out of the question study at home with someone capable of teaching you.

LONESOME GIRLIE, Kentucky.—You may be so "proud and independent" that you frighten away the boys who would like to be more friendly with you, or it may be that your parents have more money and can give you more than they could and they don't feel right about it. Perhaps if you went to the city to work and got away from your home background the men wouldn't be afraid of you,—but it would be well to be a little afraid of the men there. They'll look upon you as a girl who is alone and not as a girl who has a good home and parents and husky brothers to protect her. It makes a difference.

CURLY HAIR AND BLUE EYES, North Carolina.—If you go to church with boys, just as good little girls and boys, then it is all right. If you are regarding the boys as "fellows" then it is all wrong. You are too young for that sort of thing. Wear your hair in a braid or curls down your back and don't try to be so grownup. It is silly.

BROKEN-HEARTED SHORTY, Tennessee.—If I didn't know that at seventeen hearts have a miraculous way of mending themselves I'd feel sorry for you but you'll be all right. Next time don't "fuss" at a man. Men don't like it, particularly if they are to blame. If you were in the wrong tell him so but if he doesn't love you it is better to let the matter drop. Rehashed and warmed over love is never satisfactory.

BELL, Texerkana.—If the "spat" over the length of your skirts was with your mother then she wins. Wear them as she thinks best.

JANIE, Virginia.—I don't know how to make a bashful boy talk unless you have him equipped with strings so that he will say "Papa" and "Mamma" when you pull them.

SUNSHINE, N. J.—There really is no reply to make to your letter only to tell you that I consider you a clever girl to thus carry on your school and housework, and to congratulate you on your choice of a Dad. Read this to him. It ought to be good for a new dress.

FORSAKEN GIRLIE, N. C.—If he really loved and respected you he would have believed in you and not thought it necessary to "try you out." Now that he has found that you aren't as "easy" as he thought you'll probably go on loving him, though it would be a fitting time to drop him. However, suit yourself. (2) Eight years' difference in ages isn't too much, provided you wait until you are 20 and he is 28, but not 16 and 24. (3) Your childish wrong doing shouldn't be held against you now that you are older and know how to behave. Keep on respecting yourself and gradually others will respect you.

CURLY-HEADED RUBYE, Kentucky.—Don't ask me to set a date for your wedding without teling me more about your fiance other than that he is nineteen and as good and true as an angel. I don't know how true angels are, they always looked rather frivolous to me, flying around all the time and playing on a harp. If he has a home of his own to take you to and doesn't expect you to live with his family, and conditions are unpleasant at home, such a youthful marriage might work out all right, but as a rule I'm very "sot" against the idea.

TRY-TO-BE-CHEERFUL, Missouri.—It is very likely that you hurt him by going with another fellow as much as he hurt you by taking another girl out, and you started it. From the friendly coolness of your letters he may think that you no longer care for him. You needn't necessarily ask him to come to see you and your letters needn't be affectionate, but I'm sure you are clever enough to make him suggest coming to see you. If you really feel that your life's happiness is at stake you can afford to humble your pride a little. It is better to do that even if you learn that he doesn't care for you, than to discover in after years that he cared and that only your pride kept you apart. You know, "Of all sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are these, it might have been."

CAROLINE AND LUCY, Wyoming.—No, it isn't right for girls of sixteen to go to dances and on car rides with strange men, and never with strange men at any age. No, you are not old enough for beaux. I can understand why the other girls called you man haters. That's just the way you impressed me. Can't find your first letter. Maybe I will sometime.

BRUNETTE, Tennessee.—Don't give your studies up now for work or men, and don't marry either of the boys you describe. The first one is too young and the other doesn't sound lucky to me. You'll have heaps better chances to marry later on and be better able to judge men. There's nothing like a business career if you want to study men.

BLONDE, Tennessee.—If you can't be true to each other while you are away during the summer you'd better not marry. Absence is a good test. Every engaged couple should be compelled to stay away from each other three months, at least, before their marriage, and not even correspond. If they did that there would be fewer divorces. (2) Tell your chum if she doesn't care for the fellow and her mother doesn't like him, it would be unkind to encourage him.

MISS M. S., Ohio.—If he said he would write as soon as he got a job and settled down we can only infer that he hasn't got a job or else he hasn't settled down, the latter more likely. His stepmother knows him better than you do so don't take him seriously until he proves that he is serious. This way you'll save yourself much unhappiness.

MISS C., St. Charles, Mich.—To think that I should be dictating styles to St. Charles, Michigan. Makes me feel like a radio. Brown seems to be worn very much this winter, but wear the color that is most becoming to you regardless of whether it is fashionable or not. Anything that looks good is fashionable to my way of thinking. (2) Knickers look better on slim people than on fat ones, if they aren't too slim. (3) A girl should consider well before giving her picture to any man.

Gotta trot along now and buy my valentines.

COUSIN MARION.

The tones of the instrument inspired her in a moment, and she soon lost all thought of self and her listener in her intense enjoyment of the sounds which her soul so loved to hear.

"Sing something, Meta," whispered Mattie, who had stood by in wondering surprise at her friend's accomplishments, and had only waited for a pause to make her request.

Without a demur, she moderated her touch into an accompaniment, and sang that beautiful little song, "Your Mission," the words of which had been running in her head ever since she had first entered that disagreeable factory.

She sang the first verses beautifully, but the third was too much for her, and ere the second line was finished she broke down utterly, and bowing her head upon the piano, she had to let the bitter tears have their way.

It was a song which Miss Mehetabel had dearly loved, and many times during the past year, when they had been sitting in the twilight together, she had sung it to her.

In a moment she remembered that she was in the presence of a stranger, and almost as suddenly as she had broken down she recovered herself and rising from the piano-stool she signified to Mattie her desire to return home.

Upon the first outbreak of her grief, the old gentleman had retired to the farther side of the room, that his presence need not embarrass her.

He now came forward, and she saw that his own eyes were shining with tears.

He held out his hand to her, and there was a note of tenderness in his voice as he said:

"My young friend, forgive me for taxing your patience and good nature to such an extent, and allow me to say that you have given me more pleasure during this half hour than I have experienced this many a day."

Brownie gave him her hand, and while holding it he asked:

"And now will you allow me just one more question?"

She bowed, wondering what was coming next.

"I do not know what your circumstances may be," he said with a little embarrassment, "but could you be persuaded to teach?"

"Yes, sir, if I could feel satisfied that I was competent to fill the position offered me," Brownie replied frankly.

It had been her desire to teach from the first, but no opportunity had offered and she had resolved to secure the first situation of whatever nature, if honorable, that she could obtain.

"I am happy to hear it," returned the old man. "You ought to be a teacher of languages and music. Now, if you will kindly give me your name and address, I will endeavor to call upon you at an early date and talk with you further regarding the matter."

Brownie did as requested, and did not fail to notice his start of surprise when she mentioned her connection with the firm of Ware & Coolidge, nor the contraction of his finely-shaped brows which followed it.

He then presented his card to her, after which he lifted his hat, and bowed to the girls as if they had been the most aristocratic ladies in the land, and then left them.

Brownie looked at the card.

It bore the name of Wm. H. Alcott, M. D.

Wondering what object Wm. H. Alcott, M. D., could have in view regarding her, she carefully put the little bit of pasteboard in her pocketbook, and then the two young girls hastened home, arriving there just as their landlady was about locking the doors for the night.

"You're late," she said grimly and with a suspicious look into Brownie's beautiful face, she added: "I don't believe in girls o' your age walking the streets at this time o' night. I only advertise to take respectable boarders."

Brownie's proud spirit boiled at these insulting words, but she did not deign to notice them further than by lifting her proud head a trifle more haughtily as she swept up the stairs to her own room, followed by the more subdued and trembling Mattie.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

A. R., Washington.—For your eighth grade Washington's Birthday party, send your invitations out in the form of hatchets about six inches in length, which you have cut from stiff red paper or cardboard. Write on each some little verse such as the following:

"In honor of George Washington, the Father of Our nation,
A party I have planned to give, so here's your invitation!"

Follow this with place, date and hour, and sign your name. There are many appropriate games which you might play. One of the most amusing is to distribute stiff paper and pencils and ask each guest to draw some famous event in American history. Allow ten minutes for this, and then have each participant label his sketch, turn down the name he has given it so it cannot be seen, and pass the picture on to his neighbor at the right—who guesses what the drawing means, writes down his guess, turns down the paper again and passes it on to the next. No matter how imperfect or ludicrous the drawing may be, the fun is all the greater. When all the sketches have been passed around, they may be collected, exhibited, and the guesses read aloud, together with a true name given each historical picture by its artist. A game called "Historical Questions" is also interesting. Distribute slips on which ten questions have been written, such as: "Name four signers of the Declaration of Independence. What were the Thirteen Original States? Give three battles of the Revolutionary War." For this game a prize of some book dealing with Washington's life and times might be given to the one making the best record in filling in the answers. Also crayon sketches of ten well-known national flags may be made and exhibited, and a prize of a small silk American flag, or a small bust of Washington given to the young guest, either boy or girl, who most quickly can write the names of all the ten correctly. For your table decorations have a small branch in the center to represent a cherry tree. To this fasten candied cherries and lead from the tree to each place a narrow red ribbon at the end of which is a small red crepe-paper basket containing candied cherries or other sweets. For refreshments, serve cold chicken, hot tea biscuits, potato salad, currant jelly, coffee and cocoa, ice cream and small fancy cakes.

Bobby Dimples, Olympia, Wash.—As your parents have no objections, we see nothing wrong in your going to dances with your married sister as your chaperon. We are taking it for granted that both your sisters and your parents would not allow a girl of sixteen to attend any public dance unchaperoned. (2) Surely no girl needs any rule or course of instruction on how to let a boy know she "cares just lots" for him. This should be easiest thing in the world to let him find out unless he be deaf, dumb and blind. Your mistake is in thinking that because you care "lots," he may have more than friendly feelings in mind. If you have known him all your life he should have had time to let you know his real feelings and you to let him see how much you care. Really it might be the wisest course to let him think you cared little instead of "lots." Boys are queer creatures and need as much management as young colts. And this doesn't mean they should be fed too many lumps of sugar!

Uncertain, North Carolina.—It would be the pleasant and proper course to give a kiss as a greeting to those aunts and other feminine kindred whom you have not seen for several years. You need not wait for them to take the first step. Let them know you are fond of them and glad to see them again. Any hesitation in greeting or affection might prove embarrassing to both of you.

N. A., Edgewood, Ga.—Pullman seats are numbered on the side of the car, the figures usually being painted on the panelled woodwork just in front of each seat. A porter should show you to your seat, and if he does not and you are in doubt of being correctly seated, call him and ask for your proper location. (2) Your other inquiry is being answered by mail.

Black Eyes, Liberal, Kansas.—We think it is you who are the one who should be able to tell whether these puzzling remarks made by this boy are only carelessness and ignorance or are deliberately meant to be improper and offensive. We have never heard what he says or how he says it and you have. The repetition of the offense or the circumstances under which it is made should help you to know if it is more than a "bad break." But if you suspect the boy is not all "the soul of kindness and truth that you describe, we think you should promptly take some steps to find this out. Ask others what they know or think about him, for instance, or, better yet, ask him deliberately what some of his remarks mean which you do not like. If able to tell from his answers whether his offenses are "bad breaks" or if you should have a "bad break" with him at once. A little plain speaking never harms.

A. L. C., Williamstown, S. C.—These are the days of feminine independence, and a man and woman walk side by side and not arm in arm—whether they be married or not has no effect on this ruling. A man's arm is not taken by a woman unless in some difficult crowded or dangerous situation when assistance or protection is needed.

B. W. and F. W., Garnett, Kans.—We do not think it would be bad manners for a girl to take a boy aside from a crowd and speak to him alone. Of course the way in which this was done would have much to do with its correctness or impropriety. (2) The remarks you quote are silly and vulgar slang. They should not be used by any girl or boy. If one has nothing better than this in the way of conversation, silence would be decidedly preferable.

A Subscriber, Tennessee.—We think your husband or the girl with whom he is teaching should be able to give you a reasonable explanation as to why he handles the girl's mail and has it come in his care. But you should ask pleasantly and carelessly about this and if an explanation is given we do not think you should consider the practice strange or having a flavor of impropriety. Possibly it is more convenient and safer for her to have her mail come in this manner than to the family with whom she boards. Be careful of making a mountain of suspicion out of what may be a most simple little mole-hill. (2) You should not think it improper of your husband to borrow books of this girl or that she should send to town by him to get books for her. There is no sign of wrong in this. Necessarily by teaching together they have developed some mental interests in common. We do not think you could interfere with such interests or would wisely wish to do it. Of course your letter shows you to be plainly uneasy regarding your husband's daily association with this girl in his work. But if you cannot trust him, your uneasiness will do you little good in the matter. Certainly on the face of your letter you have no cause for taking him to task. Probably he rightly "gets mad" at objections or remarks you may have made in a suspicious or unloving way. Remember you cannot hold a man's love by distrust or demands. If affection is really wandering, which we do not believe, you cannot draw your husband back by voicing suspicion and recrimination. If your husband should care anything for this girl, your only course is to make him care more for you. Show him you are better worth caring for. Anger and distrust will never do this and will only push forward what you wish to have cease. But we think your worry is unneeded.

Sunshine, Kentucky.—There would be no harm in your sending a post card of greeting to this young man and then waiting to see if he writes. (2) If you go with this young man to a church social and he is a stranger in your community, necessarily you would introduce him to others of the guests and to your friends. We do not think that you should then "leave him to his fate," as your letter has it. It would be taken for granted that you would be returning together and so you would naturally be more or less his companion through the evening's entertainment. This does not mean, of course, that you might not leave his side, but you would not be either kind or courteous if you dropped him to drown in the strange social sea to which you had taken him. And if there is any young man there for whom you care more, we think he will understand the situation and your responsibility to your household's guest.

P. H., Edgewood, Ga.—Punch is drunk from a cup and is not eaten with a spoon. (2) Say to your hostess at this "linen shower": "Thanks for the delightful time you have given us."

M. E. V., Great Falls, S. C.—If you think you now love this "sailor boy" it should not yet be too late to answer the letter he once sent you. Do this now and see if he responds. We fear he may have found a girl in another port, though, who is a prompter correspondent.

"Please, Sir Charles, take my mistress away! I am sure this place is dangerous."

Sir Charles privately agreed with her, but he was not used to dictation from a lady's maid.

"As Miss Hamilton likes," he said stiffly.

Gillian, her eyebrows raised in unspoken question, stared at her maid, who nodded sharply.

"Go back, quick! Get out of the way," she muttered authoritatively, "or you'll ruin us."

"It's not there!" Gillian shook with excitement. "You won't try that?" with a glance at that water that lipped the foot of the wall.

"No, Miss Hamilton!" she bent forward and whispered sharply. "Go away, both of you. Let me alone."

For once she forgot to keep her eyes down. As she drew back Vivian noticed them, darkly blue, imperious. She put her hand out, almost touching him, as if she were an equal.

"If you please, sir, take my mistress away! None of this ground is safe." The words were humble, the tone made them an order. Gillian stepped back.

"She's right," she said. "Come, Sir Charles! Jacky, be careful—please be careful," and not till they were yards away on the muddy path did the amazed Vivian remember that all the time they had talked in whispers.

Round the first turn of the path was a bench. Gillian sat down, and Sir Charles leaned moodily against the embankment. He heard a curious rustling in the branches over by the pool and looked at Gillian.

On an impulse that was to stand her in good stead one day, she put her hand on his arm.

"Sir Charles"—she hesitated—"you think my maid's manner is—you think I can't be quite sensible?"

"I think, if you ask me, honestly, that there is something strange about you both."

Gillian's face was raised, her eyes grown suddenly dark and beseeching, as she looked up at him they filled with tears.

"Can I trust you with a great secret?" she said. "You've seen so much, if I tell you more can you be silent?"

"Forever," stoutly, "if it's your secret!"

"It's this." She looked at his honest eyes and hurried on lest caution might stop her. "I would not tell you, only I know you guess something. My maid is my sister! Mr. Marchmont wouldn't let her come here; wouldn't let me go to her; we had never been parted. So Jacky managed—this! No one, not even Marchmont, has ever suspected her till you did today. You'll think me deceitful, dreadful; but I was so lonely. I couldn't——" Vivian cut her short.

"I think you ought not stay with the man one day longer," he said viciously, longing to take her then and there to his heart and comfort the poor, lonely child whose great secret was so innocent. "From what I've seen of him I think you would be perfectly justified."

He sat down beside her, forgetting even to wonder where the sister had gone, as Gillian in a pitiful whisper, poured out the story of Jacky, her face bleach, her comforting presence in that lonely house.

Not a word of anything else escaped her. Yet something seemed to have holden her trust Vivian, for her own sake and Jacky's, with as much of this secret as she dared tell.

They never thought of Jacky herself, crouched down under the wall, holden utterly by the hanging ivy, waiting breathlessly for something.

For, just at the side of the pool, at the height of a tall man's head in the solid masonry of the embankment, were two long slits that might have been for drainage of the wood above.

Might have been, but assuredly were not, for through them Jacky Hamilton saw in the deep shadow where she stood the quick flash of a light that vanished immediately.

She had found the "other way."—And someone was inside!

Reward No. 9882

Full Opera Length

THE dream of every woman and girl is to possess her own necklace of gleaming, iridescent pearls. There's a wonderful fascination about them—a beauty that appeals to every feminine heart.

Now your dream can come true—for we are giving away this handsome, full opera length rope of Parisian pearls. It is 54 inches long, all the pearls are of uniform size—¼ inch in diameter—of perfect finish and luster, far handsomer than the ordinary imitation pearl necklace sold at a high price. It can easily be wound twice around the neck, making the double rope as shown in our illustration.

By rare good luck we secured first choice of these necklaces from a large importer and at a price that enables us to give them for an unusually small club. Please read the following offer and learn how you can get a beautiful, 54-inch rope of pearls free of all cost.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this handsome, opera length Pearl Necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9882.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

M. D. A., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we think you assumed the burden of conveying good title to your property when you signed the contract for the sale or exchange of the same, and that if you are now unable to procure all the signatures to the deed to convey good title to the property you are liable to the purchaser for such damage as he has suffered, and to the real estate agent for his commission for making the sale.

MRS. B. F. T., Tennessee.—Upon the death of your husband, without a will, we are of the opinion that in addition to your homestead rights in case your husband leaves a homestead, you will be entitled to dower, unless relinquishd, of a one-third interest for life in the real estate belonging to your husband in both Virginia and Tennessee, and, after payment of debts and expenses from the personal estate, a child's share of such personal estate, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to your husband's children by both marriages.

MRS. C. H. K., Minnesota.—Unless you have been legally adopted by the judgment or decree of some court of competent jurisdiction, we do not think you have any inheritance rights in your foster parents' estates, unless some provision is made for you by will.

MRS. D. P., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would receive one-half of both the real and personal estate, and in addition thereto certain small allowances from the personal property; we think any vested interest the decedent might have in the estate of an ancestor would be divided as a part of his estate, but we do not think his widow would be an heir or next of kin to his parents, nor have any inheritance rights in their estates, unless he survived them and became vested with an interest in their estates, in which event his widow would receive her share of his interest as well as her share of whatever other property he left.

J. W. McK., Kansas.—If your debtor refuses or neglects to pay his indebtedness to you it will be necessary for you to bring an action against him to enforce the payment of the debt; if, however, he has no property you will be unable to collect.

P. W., Oregon.—We do not think your parents have any legal right to compel you to marry the man of their selection, but we think their consent is necessary for you to marry the man of your own selection if you are under 18 years of age.

MRS. J. B. H., Missouri.—We think your mother's will should have been probated at once after her death, and if your brother has held same from the records for 18 months after her death, you should bring a proceeding against him to compel him to file same.

MISS R. S., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that an application should be made to your local courts for the appointment of a committee or guardian to attend to the business affairs of the man who has become mentally incompetent; we do not think his wife has any legal right to sign his name to check or drafts for the drawing of his bank accounts without such an appointment.

V. W., Texas.—We think you should have an examination made of the records of the county in the state where the property you mention is situated in order to determine the name of the present title holder.

MISS E. S., South Carolina.—If your cousin refuses or neglects to repay the money he borrowed from you, we think it will be necessary for you to sue him to enforce the payment of the same.

MRS. A. E. H., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against a verbal contract express or implied written four years, but that a new promise, a payment on account or any other evidence of indebtedness after the debt is barred revives it, and that the statute ceases to operate while the plaintiff labors under a legal disability or while defendant absents or conceals himself; under the laws of Wyoming, we think the statute of limitations against an action on a contract not in writing runs within eight years, but on foreign claims, judgments, or contracts, express or implied, contracted or incurred before the debtor becomes a resident of the state, actions must be commenced within five years after the debtor shall have established a residence in the state, with the provisions as to revival disabilities and absentees as above set forth. We think in both states the time limit specifies different periods for other causes of action.

M. J., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the estate of an intestate (person dying without a will) descends to the surviving wife or husband where no child nor descendants of a child are left by such intestate.

J. N., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that actions for injury wrongfully done to the person where the injury does not result in death must be brought within two years.

MRS. W. S., Iowa.—Under the laws of California, we are of the opinion that all property, both real and personal, of either husband or wife, owned before marriage, and all acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise or descent, with the rents, issues and profits thereof, is separate property, and may be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, encumbered or assigned without the consent of the other spouse; but all other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, including real property situated in this state, and personal property wherever situated, acquired while domiciled elsewhere, which would not have been the separate property of either if acquired while domiciled in this state, is community property, and the husband has the management and control of such community personal property with power of disposition, other than testamentary, as of his separate estate, except that he cannot dispose of same without valuable consideration, or sell or encumber household furniture or wearing apparel of the family without written consent of the wife; and the husband has the control of the community real property, but the wife must join in any instrument conveying or encumbering any interest greater than a lease for one year. (2) We think your creditor is entitled to the cash payment of your debt to him, unless he is willing to accept the property you mention in payment of such debt.

MISS I. G., Texas.—We think a marriage between an uncle and niece is prohibited by the laws of every state in the United States.

I. G., New Mexico.—We do not think there is any law prohibiting your living alone with your small son upon your property if you desire to do so; we think it may be unwise for a woman and small child to do so in case your house is in a poorly settled locality, and that you should consider both yourself and child before making such a decision.

MRS. H. M., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that property in your state, real and personal, of residents or non-residents, dying without a will, descends and is distributed, when there is no child nor descendant of a child and no widow or surviving husband, to the parents, brothers and sisters and their descendants equally, allowing each of the parents, if living, a child's part, or the survivor a double portion; and if there is no parent living, then to the brothers and sisters and their descendants.

MRS. O. B. P., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think that the parents are liable for the payment of a bill for medical services rendered their adult children unless such parents have obligated themselves for the payment of the same or unless such adult child has always been a physical or mental incompetent.

G. O. B., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it would have been necessary for your mother to have survived your father in order to have acquired a vested interest in his property, and upon her death during his lifetime you acquired no interest therein except that you still are entitled to a child's share of his estate, unless cut off by will, in case you survive him.

M. W., Missouri.—We are of the opinion that the consent of the parents is necessary for the marriage of females under 18 years of age by the laws of Missouri, Illinois, Ohio or Arkansas.

D. R., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your husband has no interest in your property during your lifetime except that you cannot sell or mortgage your real estate without his consent, and that in case he survives you he is entitled to his inheritance rights in your estate.

MRS. J. T. S., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if you survive your husband and he leaves no will, you and such of the children as may be infants will receive an exemption of $750 from the personal property, and in addition thereto you will receive one-half of the surplus of the personal estate after the payment of debts and expenses, the balance going to his children by both marriages in equal shares. Your separate property will not be distributed as his estate.

MRS. A. F., Maine.—Under the laws of your state, and in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, we do not think your husband can substantiate a charge against you for the support of your child by a former marriage. (2) We think you should have made an agreement in writing as to the conditions of the transfer of your real estate to your husband.

MRS. M. S., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that life insurance, upon the death of the insured, becomes payable to the beneficiary named in the policy, so that a policy payable to the insured or to his estate upon his death becomes an asset of his estate, and the proceeds thereof could be applied to the payment of his debts, but if the insured had named his wife or mother as the beneficiary such beneficiary would upon his death become entitled to the proceeds of the policy and the same would not be a part of the insured's estate. Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the signature of the wife is necessary for the release of her inchoate right of dower in the conveyance of real estate by the husband.

Which of these Instruments Would YOU Like to Play?

Amazing Free Test Shows If You Have Musical Ability

SURELY there is a favorite musical instrument you would like to play. Surely you will be glad to take advantage of this interesting free offer.

The test comprises just a few simple questions devised by a famous musical instructor. They may show that you have been depriving yourself of pleasures which nature has particularly fitted you to enjoy. You may have never played a note in your life. You may never have attempted to sing in public. Yet you may have natural talent that would make it easy for you to excel in music. Your hidden abilities will be quickly disclosed to you by the free test.

and for sale. This is a new country and people come and go. There's plenty of work in camps, and as housekeepers for women. The climate is healthy, lots of game. Wages are good and if a man isn't afraid of work and wants a start it is a good place. There is a school at Lost Lake and a store. There's lots of land with wild hay and part can be cleared and planted to grain. Write to the Land Office at Peace River, Alta., for maps and information. Please don't write to me for any more information; otherwise I would love to hear from you but I can't promise to answer personally. Anyone wishing to come up here could write to The Immigrant Agent, Portal, Can., Alta., for settlers' rates and half-fare ticket information. When in Portal and Edmonton or Lethbridge, inquire for the Immigrant Hall, where one can stay until your train goes. The best time to come is in the spring, not later than March as the roads get too soft. The winter is the best time to get out logs for buildings. Automobiles can come as far as Edmunton, but will have to be shipped 300 miles to Peace River, which is a small town. The trees here are birch, spruce, alders, tamaracks and poplars. Some lakes have fish. A homestead consists of 160 acres. A widow with dependent children can file. Take from three to five years to prove up. Land improved sells for $1,000 to $8,000, unimproved from $800 to $1,100 per 160 acres.

MRS. A. M. ALLEN.

ALPENA, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I never will be able to express how happy I was to find my letter in the Sisters' Corner in the October number of our dear COMFORT. I was almost discouraged and thought my letter went into the waste-basket for I sent it quite a while ago. Thank you, dear Mrs. Wilkinson, for your kind answer to my letter. I am so glad to be welcome among the sisters and how I would love to know our "mother" for isn't Mrs. Wilkinson like a mother to us?

I have received hundreds of letters from the the sisters but cannot answer all of them. I want to tell them through COMFORT that I did enjoy reading the letters and am sorry I cannot answer every one of them. I answered quite a number and made some good pen friends all over the United States.

We left the farm and are now living in a little town of about 15,000 inhabitants, named Alpena. My husband did not like farming very well and thought we would do better in town. Alpena is situated on the Lake Huron shore and is a neat little town. There is a big cement factory that employs about 3,000 men.

With best love to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters,

FRENCHIE.

ILLINOIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for over a year and like very much to read the sisters' letters. Some of the writers seem to have such good educations and I have so little that it makes my heart ache. I am married and the mother of two little daughters, the oldest nine and the youngest six and both are in school. The older one is in the fourth grade and would you believe it, I am so poorly educated that I cannot help her with her lessons and it causes me many a heartache. My husband has a common school education and has to help the children with their lessons, especially arithmetic, as I know nothing about it. I can change money very well and add a little and that's about all. Often at night when my husband is busy he will tell the little girls to get their mother to help them with their lessons and the oldest one wil say, "Now daddy, you know mother doesn't know anything about this," and it hurts me to have her say it, and it does make her feel big that she is wiser than mother.

If parents would only realize the need of it they would make every effort to educate their children. My father is a well-educated man but my mother died when I was four years old and father married a young girl and she had children very fast and that kept my sister and me at home to care for the babies. I went to school only part of three winters and I was married when I was fifteen. I have been married ten years and never before realized how much I needed an education until the last two years. Since I have been married my father has gone in business for himself and that has brought all of us up in the social circle of this little town and I am always in fear that I will be called upon to do something I can't, so you see my life isn't as happy as it would be if I had more education. I can talk well and have good manners and some of my best friends would not believe this letter if they should read it.

I would like to hear from someone who could tell me some way I might educate myself.

UNEDUCATED MOTHER.

WEBBER'S FALLS, OKLA.

May I come in for a few minutes? I am a wheel-her dead body he called God's bitterest curse down on me. Then he took you and disappeared and we hunted everywhere we thought we had a clue; but at last I hold you in my arms, they are old and weak now but loving, oh! so loving; and we do not even know your name." She patted his smooth, dark face with her thin, shaking hands and tried to cuddle his head against her as if in reality it were that long lost baby she was holding.

"I was christened Elmo Clary Egle. I did not know what the Clary stood for until just before Elspeth died. Then she told me that my mother named me before I was born, so sure was she of the sex of her baby, and if it had not been for Elspeth I would never have known but that grandfather was my father. I looked like him and was always so large for my age that no one ever doubted my parentage. But Elspeth thought I should know the truth so she told me everything. She said my mother had a most loving and forgiving nature and she knew it would be her wish that I come and see you and my own father, and I promised her I would. Then when she died my grandfather had her brought back here, but he absolutely refused to let me come. So he hired a boat to bring her, then the same year he sent me away to a boy's school in New York. I went from there to college and was never home until they wired me he was sick. He came to see me every few weeks and took all the interest in my work any father possible could and when I took up journalism and made good he was perfectly satisfied. I never liked the sea and it was only the last year he told me that mother had always hated it; but the sea was his dearest friend, for when he was dying he asked that I bring him back, and at sunset last night we laid him down to his last long sleep, within sound of waters he loved in life." He paused, looking at Tina with grief-stricken eyes. She came and leaned against his shoulder, caressing him silently.

"Didn't he ever consent to your coming to see us?" the old lady's quivering voice was beseeching.

"Yes, Granny, he told me to come and these are his own words: 'I might have been hard on her, I did not think I was but Elspeth did. She said that blood was thicker than water, and that you would love me too; and they cannot change the man I have trained.' Those last are his words, Granny dear, not mine; and he had much to forgive, too. Now," he went on in a lighter tone, "we will talk about you awhile. And what do you call this little sister of mine, Granny?"

The old lady regarded her granddaughter with fond eyes. "Her name is Tina but I always call her baby, she seems like a baby to me yet."

"Yes," Tina retorted, "they seem to think you were a baby, but you are a trifle overgrown, if I am any judge."

He smiled happily. "It is so nice to have a family. I always wanted 'folks'; the boys at school were always talking about their 'folks,' and I soon learned it was mother, sisters and sometimes 'some other fellow's sisters' that made home so attractive. But dad, as I always called him, and I boarded around for years, for he broke up the home at Elspeth's death." He broke off abruptly. "How old are you, Tina?" he asked in the next breath. "You must look like your mother." He was looking at her intently.

"I am past eighteen," she answered readily. Then she turned to Granny. "Do you think I look like mamma? I never thought much about it." Granny had never thought much about it, either. "Just in a general way, I guess, baby dear."

The nurse came forward. "It is just dinner time, Miss Tina, and I think your grandmother should rest awhile."

Both young folks jumped up contritely. "We did stay too long, Granny dear," Tina exclaimed as she stooped and kissed the wrinkled face. "But I knew you wanted to hear all about our Elmo, so we will go have dinner and then come in and say good night."

They went out together, hand in hand like a pair of children, and as the door closed behind them he stopped and, throwing an arm around her, drew her back against him. "Tina girl, do I really seem like a brother?" he asked wistfully, "and what do you suppose your mother will say?"

"For one thing, she will not approve of your affection for me," Tina's thoughts raced ahead. "Nobody pays any attention to mamma," she replied evasively, "and she will never find any fault with you when I am by."

"You dear little champion," the young man murmured, his lips against her bright hair. "But I do not want you to fight any of my battles if she should get aggressive, send her to me." They went into the dining-room where Tina presented him to Seward and two of the maids.

"I knew who it was, Miss Tina, as soon as I looked at him," the old butler said proudly. "Didn't he look at me with his mother's beautiful eyes, and wasn't it her own mischievous smile on his face as he greeted me?" He paused, turning his head in a listening attitude, then clear and distinct came Cleo's shrill peevish voice and Guy's harsh and abusive.

Tina turned to Seward. "Mercy, me, they are fighting again worse than Kilkenny cats. Go out and tell them to get the fur out of their claws and come and shake hands with their son." Seward obeyed with alacrity.

Elmo's face showed shocked surprise but Tina made light of the fighting for it was an everyday occurrence if they were both at home. The door opened and Guy came running in, his eyes big and staring, his face gray. Elmo met him half way, hand extended, but Guy threw his arms over the broad shoulders of his son and sobbed like a woman.

He cried over and over, "My son, my son, I had given up ever seeing you, and those eyes, oh! my boy, you would never need a birth certificate to prove your parentage."

"No, father, I might not but I have one, anyway; that was one of the few things that grandfather guarded so jealously." He released himself from Guy's clinging hands and turned to his stepmother who was staring at him in terror. But only for a moment, then she offered her hand and bade him welcome in what an outsider might have thought a friendly manner, but Elmo, whose work took him among all kinds of people, caught the undercurrent of fear in her voice.

They took their places at the table and were served by a most important Seward, for hadn't he been slapped on the back in a friendly way until he was sure the prints of those same fingers were still there. He looked at the young man fondly, murmuring an inaudible prayer.

Cleo returned to the subject of the birth certificate. "Are you sure it is authentic? Who signed it?"

"Dr. Woodward, I think is the man. Daddy said he was in attendance when my mother was born, and any of the older people of the hamlet would know his signature."

"Of conrse they would," Cleo admitted, and in some cases they are a necessity, but we haven't Tina's yet."

"You will have to get it then," Guy interrupted rudely, "for I never knew what doctor or nurse attended you." Cleo's face flushed a brick red then whitened until Elmo thought she would collapse, but no one paid any attention.

Presently they went to the cool, pleasant drawing-room, where Elmo must repeat everything in his life that touched upon his own welfare. Tina was always close by, much to the chagrin of her mother. For would not the estate have to be divided? And it would be like Guy, in these first maudlin days, to deed Elmo the biggest half. But she was mistaken, for when Guy broached the subject and asked him to take his place in the world as his son, Elmo refused pointblank.

"Not that I am holding any grudge, you must not think that, but I like my work and I feel that I owe grandfather that much to go ahead in the way he wanted me to. I am going to have the old cottage repaired and furnished and hire some one to take care of it. Tina will see it is kept up for me so I can come down to a home any time." He laughed in Cleo's telltale face, and pulled Tina over against him. It was such a relief to Cleo to find he did not intend to become a member of the family.

Tina got to her feet still holding to his hand. "Come, baby brother, we had better go bid Granny good night or she will not sleep a wink." But the nurse met them at the door and whispered that she had been sleeping like a baby for an hour and must not be disturbed.

Tina took him across the hall to the door of the guest-room, lifting her face for his kiss in the most natural way in the world. "I am so glad you came, dear boy, I understand why papa loves your mother's picture better than he ever did mamma," she stopped for lack of breath.

He swept her up in his powerful arms and held her tighter than he knew. "You are the most lovable child in this wide world," he cried, his tawny eyes shining with a light foreign to them. "As long as you love me I do not care for the opinion of any one." He kissed her passionately and stood her on her feet. "There dear, trot along to your beauty sleep. It is midnight and time all little girls were in bed." She turned away and he stood watching her until her door closed behind her.

Then he went in but he hardly noticed the beautiful rugs or the expensive furniture that filled the room. His thoughts were all on Tina. "You fool," he railed at himself, "you are half in love with your sister." He never made a move to prepare for bed, but sat down by the window, staring out into the night. "No, by heaven," he vowed to himself, "nature does not make those mistakes, and that is why there is no birth certificate. I can find out easily." In a few minutes he was sleeping, in the same room his young mother had gone from to her last resting place.

A week later he had met and visited with all of the old friends of his mother and grandfather, and because he was an Egle in appearance they talked freely with him about his father's and stepmother's affair. Their opinion was much the same as his. They did not think the girl Tina belonged to them at all for one time the missus had wanted to adopt a little motherless boy in the hamlet, and Guy had rudely reminded her he had a boy of his own, somewhere, and he did not intend no fisherman's brat to cheat him out of his birthright. In less than a year she had brought this little girl home as her own.

A little judicious questioning of Granny brought the information that Cleo had spent about three months in Boston and a week or so in the little town of Yant, about two hundred miles inland, the year Tina was born. From this interview he went straight to Cleo's room and rapped at her door. She opened it at once and stood staring at him, her eyes wide with fear, and all the pretty color draining from her face.

"I want to talk to you a few minutes, Cleo," he informed her coolly. She stepped back and he went in, closing the door and stood leaning against it, watching the embarrassed woman try to collect her scattered wits. "Of course, Cleo, you know enough of men in general to know the minute we met I was not the sort to swallow bait, hook, line, sinker and all, and I knew before the end of that first evening that Tina was not yours."

"Do not tell Guy," she wailed, "he will never forgive me, and I wanted a baby but he would not let me adopt one."

"Yes, but what was the object? You are too selfish to saddle yourself with the care of a child, unless you had an ax to grind."

Then she turned on him in a fury. "I did it to hold all of the estate I could, you scum of a fisher tribe. I knew some day you would show up and bleed your weak, silly old father until there would not be a decent living left for me." She paused for breath, her eyes glaring at him in hatred. "No, thank fortune, she is none of mine. Now what are you going to do about it?"

"Marry her," he retorted promptly. "Now I do not care who her parents are, so you are safe on that count so far as I am concerned. Now who is going to tell them?" He waited for her to consider.

"Tell them yourself," was the sullen answer. "Guy will probably refuse to live with me, and that is what you are after. But I have a few thousand tucked away where you cannot touch it."

"That is all right, Cleo, tuck all the money away you can get your fingers on, I do not want it. I have enough for my modest wants, also I have a pair of good hands and a pretty good head. If you will go to father and Tina and tell them the whole miserable story I will use my influence to reinstate you in every way."

"I will do nothing of the kind," she screamed. Running to him, she tried to push him from the door. And when she found she could not even shake him she turned and fled to an inner room and slammed the door.

Elmo went down and found Guy in the garden tying up some rose bushes. He looked up at his son's approach with adoring eyes, and Elmo came straight to the point.

"Say, father, did it ever occur to you that Tina might not be your child?" Guy stood staring at him blankly, then, "Not my child; then who the hell's is she?" He caught his son's arm in a tight grasp and shook him slightly.

"I cannot say for Cleo did not tell me, but she did tell me she was no child of hers."

"Took her from a home probably. I'll go talk to that she wolf, that black-hearted daughter of satan. I'll choke the truth out of her if I have to, and I'll kick her out of the home she ruined." He cursed himself savagely for a fool to put up with her as long as he had.

Then Elmo stopped him. "Do just as you please, of course, but go in and tell Granny's nurse that I said Cleo is not to be admitted to those rooms. Granny has been punished enough. I will not stand for any more hectoring, do not forget that." His father turned to the house, and he went in search of Tina.

Cleo left the same day, turned out by her husband. She passed Elmo on the porch on her way out and glared at him murderously, but his tawny eyes held only contempt, while a smile flickered across his handsome mouth.

Three months later there was a quiet wedding in the little church where Tina Laveine, eldest daughter of a French emigrant, and Elmo Clary went forth as man and wife. And as they walked the age-old path, now thickly strewn with autumn leaves, Guy felt as though the shadowy figure of Hortence walked beside them in silent approval of the day's ceremony.

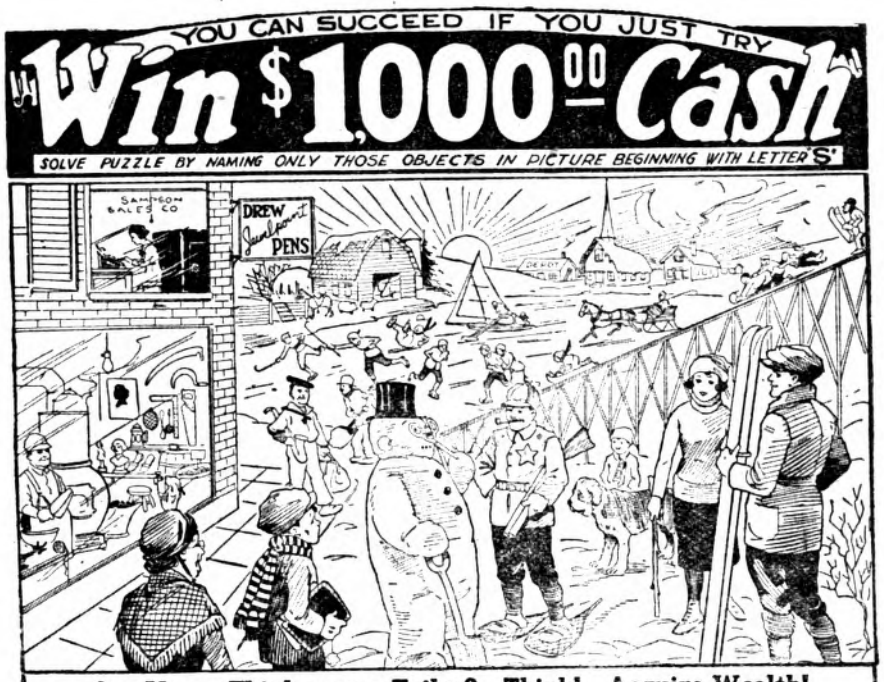
B. B., Talladega Springs, Ala.—No license need be obtained if you wish to write poetry or prose, although we have heard of ferocious editors who have themselves obtained hunting licenses to enable them to pursue persistent poets. You can obtain application for copyright and other information concerning the copyright law, by addressing the Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C.

C. H., Montezuma, Ga.—Although script need not be considered incorrect on a visiting card, what engravers call "Old English" is the form now most in vogue, we think. Plain block lettering is also much used and is rather more suitable, perhaps, for a man's card than any more elaborate style. In no case would you use "plain printing." Visiting cards and all forms of social stationery are engraved and not printed. Any stationer will show you samples and forms of visiting cards from which you can select that style most to your liking.

MRS. E. V., Clinton, Ind.—To what publisher you would best send your book when completed, would depend entirely upon what you are writing about—which you do not tell us. Prices paid for an author's work are affected largely by the reputation of the writer—which reputation need not be always a literary one. Lloyd George or the ex-Kaiser of Germany, as instances, can market their reminiscences for several dollars a word, while practically unknown scribblers about the Great War might be glad to receive a cent a word or less. The ordinary financial arrangement made for the publication of an accepted book is upon an ascending royalty basis. This is usually ten per cent. upon the first 2,500 copies and fifteen per cent. upon all sales beyond this number. Any manuscript submitted to editorial offices should be typed, double-spaced, upon typewriter paper of the usual size—eight and one-half by 11 inches. Broad margins should be left for notes and corrections. All pages should be carefully numbered at the top, and the author's name and address should appear in the upper righthand corner of the first page. Manuscripts should be mailed flat, not rolled, and sufficient stamps enclosd to pay for return postage. We believe you will have to acquire more experience than you now have before you can expect to compete with the many who are now engaged in the writing game. But one can always begin to learn.



MRS. H. L. H., Columbia, S. C.—In ancient days the phrase "dog days" became given to what was the time of greatest heat in the summer—and this, in Mediterranean latitudes happened to be the period when the dog star rose at the same time as the sun. The traditions of those days gave an evil influence to this planetary combination. Nowadays the modern almanac compilers reckon the "dog days" as being from July 24 to August 24th, although custom has seemed to place them as in the first two weeks in August.

READER, Mt. Vernon, Ill.—When you read that your grand jury has returned so many "true bills," this means that they have found that a certain number of accusations of commissions of crime are justified on the face of the evidence submitted and that the alleged offenders are to be arrested and held for trial. A "true bill" is another name for indictment. An indictment is a presentment to the court whereby the grand jury accuses one or more persons of having committed a specified crime and sets forth the facts to be proved against the accused at the trial. An indictment is called a "true bill" because each indictment concludes with the attestation clause, "A true bill," followed by the signature of the foreman of the grand jury—a mere certification that it is a genuine indictment.

MRS. B. T., Ellis, Kans.—There are 784,571 acres of vacant public land in the State of Washington. The western part of the state is a fine country for timber, and also has fertile valley lands. Of late years fruit growing has become particularly successful. Eastern Washington, not so well timbered, produces large crops of grain and dairying and general farming give good returns. The eastern and central portions of the state have waterless sections—a great part of which have been irrigated by private enterprises and by reclamation projects of which several large ones are the work of the Federal Government. Some enthusiasts claim the climate of Washington as perfection, and the claims seem justified. The mean average temperature for the year is 53 degrees and there are few extremes of heat or cold. Owing to the light snowfall cattle do not necessarily have to be fed through the winters, and there is an abundance of natural grass. There are U. S. Land Offices at North Yakima and at Seattle in the state. Write to these for further particulars. (2) Oregon has much more vacant land than Washington, and over 13,000,000 acres are open for entry. The Rogue River and Willamette valleys are the best agricultural sections of the state—the former being particularly adapted for fruit raising, especially grapes. Four years ago the state produced over 3,500,000 bushels of apples. The climate is mild and is most favorable for grain growing—one Oregon farmer getting 120 bushels of oats per acre from a 22-acre field. The eastern part of Oregon does better as a stock-raising section—there being more arid land in this vicinity, although irrigation is aiding. Near the coast the rainfall is heavy. Oregon ranks fourth as a lumber producing state. There are U. S. Land Offices at Burns, La Grande, Lakeview, Portland, Roseburg, The Dalles and Vale. You can obtain further particulars from the Register who may be in charge of each of these offices.

MRS. Y. J. MCKNIGHT, Walker, Iowa.—This COMFORT subscriber is in search of verses entitled, "The Starless Crown," one line of which is: "I did not mean that thou should'st tread the way of life alone." Perhaps some kind reader will aid and can send the words of this poem to Mrs. McKnight direct.

Drew "Square-Deal" Rules

1. Anyone living outside of St. Paul may take part in this puzzle game except employees of this company or their relatives.
2. Name only those objects visible in picture beginning with letter "S." Whichever list receives the most points will be awarded first prize, and so on down the list of 50 prizes. One point will be given for each correct word and one deducted for each incorrect word or omission of a correct word. In case of tie, prize tied for will be awarded each tying contestant. The correct list by which judging will be done will be made up from lists received and not from any so-called "master list." List winning first prize and names and addresses of all prize winners will be published at close of contest and mailed to all who have "qualified" for Class "A."
3. Use only English words. An object may be named only once, but parts of objects may also be named. Either the singular or plural of a word may be used, but not both. Words of the same spelling but different meaning or synonymous words will count only once. Compound, hyphenated and obsolete words are not permissible. Webster's International Dictionary will be the final authority.
4. Write "S"-words on one side of paper only, numbering each word 1, 2, 3, 4, etc., and be sure to write your full name and address at top of each sheet. All answers must be mailed and postmarked not later than February 3, 1923. Contestants may "qualify" for Class "A" up to midnight, February 17, 1923.
5. Three prominent St. Paul people have consented to act as Judges: M. W. Thompson, newspaperman; W. M. Johnson, Pres., Superior Printing Co., and P. M. Reagan, Pres., Wabash National Bank. All who take part in the contest agree to accept their decisions as final and conclusive.
6. ENLARGED PICTURE FREE ON REQUEST.

Olive Oil for Health

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

OLIVE oil is more than a salad dressing ingredient—it is a valuable, nourishing food and a medicine.

A tablespoonful of olive oil, three times daily with meals or half an hour after eating, also will have a gentle, persuasive action upon the liver which will accomplish more satisfactory and permanent results than a drastic course of cathartics.

As a cure for the condition that produces acid dyspepsia—either fermentative or from a too free secretion of hydro-chloric acid—olive oil, in tablespoonful doses after meals, is wonderfully effective. Cases of many years' standing, that have resisted all the usual methods, almost invariably leave the premises in deep dejection when sluiced with this oleaginous fluid.

Owing to the ease with which it is saponified (prepared for assimilation in the small intestine), olive oil is more readily absorbed than any other animal or vegetable fat. Therefore, in order to ain weight, it should be eaten or drunk religiously—either "whole," upon salads or in soups. The Italians use it freely in their cooking.

As an inunction for thin, under-nourished babies or young children, olive oil has largely supplanted cod-liver oil in the practice of many medical men.

And for that stiffness in the joints and spine—particularly in the aged—there is nothing much better than a good, vigorous massage with olive oil. The massage, however, should be sufficiently vigorous to rub the oil in and the pain and stiffness out.

For dryness of the scalp, and for falling hair and dandruff due to excessive dryness, a small quantity of olive oil, rubbed into the scalp with the finger-tips, is most excellent. It is claimed also that it contributes, by its absorption, to the nutrition of the oil-starved hair follicles. In any event, it is one of the few facts that may be safely used on the scalp, as it does not become rancid so readily as do most other animal and vegetable products.

The Italians and other southern European races use oil almost exclusively in frying meats and fish. Those who have eaten their deliciously prepared and readily digested cookery will never, of their free will and accord, go back to the greasy foods of our American cookery. Indeed, the objection to fried foods lies not so much in the frying as in the stuff we employ to fry them in. Stomach distress and fatty eructations rarely result from eating chops, steaks or fish that have been prepared with this delicate food product.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The fifteen books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting, tatting and knitting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Each book is 8 by 11 inches in size and most of them contain 32 pages. Following is a brief description of what you will find in this wonderful library. When ordering please give the number of each book wanted.

Volume 33 Twenty-one new, beautiful designs in Cluny laces, including lamp shades, curtains, bungalow sets, hats, yokes, collar and cuffs, pin-cushion, door panel, flower basket, baby cap, bib, doily, pillow-case, corset-cover, boudoir cap and corners and edges for handkerchiefs, napkins, etc. 32 pages.

Volume 34 Fourteen handsome crochet yokes, camisoles and corset-covers in medallion pointed wheel, Irish rose, shell, poinsettia, cupid, wheel, Grecian, spider, small shell and novelty braid. 32 pages.

Volume 35 Fifty-three different crochet edges for every purpose—children's clothing, handkerchiefs, towels, doilies, scarfs, etc., etc. 32 pages.

Volume 36 How to crochet beautiful Cluny laces—thirty-two different designs for library scarfs, curtains, yokes, sofa pillow centerpieces, collar and cuff set, combination, doily, boudoir caps, corset-covers, combing jacket, novelty braid and towel edge and ends. 32 pages.

Volume 37 Thirty-six new, original designs in tatting. Edges, insertions and motifs for yokes, handkerchiefs, towels, luncheon sets, piano scarfs, curtains, cushions, medallions, etc. 32 pages.

Volume 38 Twenty-eight lovely designs in crocheted centerpieces, lemonade sets, doilies, luncheon sets, lunch cloths, etc., etc. One of the very latest books to be published. 32 pages.

Volume 39 Twelve beautiful designs in crocheted yokes for slip-overs, corset-covers and nightgowns. Large, magnificent, full-page illustrations showing every stitch with complete directions for making and kind and quantity of material required is fully explained. 16 pages.

Volume 40 A continuation of Volume 39, showing twelve more exquisite yokes for corset-covers and nightgowns. Full-page illustrations. Full directions. 16 pages.

Volume 41 Crocheted bags are now all the style and this book shows twenty-nine beautiful designs for hand bags, party bags, afternoon bags, work bags, laundry bags, opera, evening and vanity bags and coin purses. 16 pages.

Volume 42 Tam sport hats and tab collars in crochet, knitting and tatting—twenty-nine designs and every one a beauty. Illustrations show large-size finished work as well as being worn by living models. 32 pages.

Volume 43 Twenty-nine lovely silk sweaters and sport hats in crochet and knitting, including the Delmar, Pershing, Rosedale, Kingsbury, Waterman, Westminster, MacPherson, Hamilton and many others. Every design is shown on a living model. 32 pages.

Volume 44 Art needle work for baby and the children. Forty-four beautiful designs in crochet and tatting for sweaters, yokes, bonnets, hats, caps, booties, filet jackets, buggy covers and pillows, bibs, dresses and leggings. 32 pages.

Volume 45 Crocheted nightgown yokes—thirteen handsome designs in clover medallion, Cluny scallop, pansy medallion, filet and spray, butterfly spray, daisy spray, iris in cross-mesh filet, poinsettia and wild rose spray. 32 pages.

Volume 46 Twenty-one designs in miscellaneous crochet including many novelties not found in other books, pillow cases, portieres, Cluny door panels, tray-cloths, crochet ball holder, tumbler doilies, and edges and medallions for scarfs, tea or luncheon cloths, napkins and pillow cases. 12 pages.

Volume 47 New ideas in crocheted edges and insertions suitable for handkerchiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses—forty-eight different designs in all. 12 pages.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor. Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS F. K., Sauk Rapids, Minn.—"Blushing" is a normal condition and there is no remedy that will prevent it. Keep your bowels free, avoid excitement and lead a normal life. In time you may overcome this tendency and, at least, forget that your face flushes up so constantly. Local applications are of no avail.

MRS. B. D., Ringgold, Ga.—Have your teeth extracted, or treated, at once. You are troubled with absorption of pus in some form, which causes your rheumatic condition. May be, also, your tonsils are enlarged and should be removed. You might take, in the meantime, five-grain tablets of salyicylate of sodium after meals. Also drink plenty of water and avoid sweets of all kinds. In this way you will get rid of your excessive flesh.

MRS. J. F. T., Sarepta, Miss.—All your symptoms are due, in the main, to indigestion. Take, after meals, compound bicarbonate of soda tablets. Also at night take two teaspoonfuls of fluid extract of cascara sagrada to keep your bowels free. Avoid sweets of all kinds, including pastries. You have no symptoms of tapeworm, as you surmise. Just follow the directions given, and you will be cured or relieved of your many and annoying discomforts.

MRS. J. J., Greensburg, Pa.—You have prolapse of the vagina and bladder walls as well. This condition causes the bladder irritation from retention of urine. You should have a vaginal support. There are many on the market, and your family doctor can get one for you and fit it so you will be relieved of your annoying symptoms. For the frequent urination take, after meals, five-grain tablets of urotropin. Drink also plenty of good spring water.

MRS. M. McC., Muscatine, Iowa.—Asafœtida pills are simply a condiment, are not "habit forming" in any sense. A good tonic and cough mixture for you to take is the following: Iodide of ammonium thirty grains, tincture of nux vomica thirty drops, tincture of belladonna fifteen drops, syrup of tolut one ounce, and water to make two ounces. Take one teaspoonful after meals.

MRS. L. M. D., Rossville, Ill.—Apply to scalp, at night the following solution: Two per cent. resorcin solution. Make the solution as follows: Forty grains of resorcin to two ounces of equal parts of rose water and grain alcohol. This should relieve the itching of your scalp and stop the falling out of your hair.

MRS. J. A. M., Glen Flora, Texas.—For the "chills and fever," of malarial origin, no remedy is as efficient as Warburg's tincture. Take, after meals, a tablespoonful of the tincture well diluted. Also keep your bowels free at all times.

MRS. W. B., Freewater, Oregon.—You should have the lacerated cervix operated on. Only in this way will you be well again and the discharge cured. Select some good general surgeon and have the parts restored to normal.

MRS. A. M., Eolia, Ky.—Take a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture, well diluted, after meals. After you have taken this tonic for two or three weeks, take, morning and night, two-grain capsules of ovarian substance. The latter tablets will no doubt restore your periods to normal as to amount and regularity.

MISS C. W., Panama, Okla.—For the scalp condition mentioned, apply to the scalp at night raw linseed oil to remove or soften the scales. The following morning wash the scalp with some good tar soap. After you have the scales removed in this way, apply a two per cent. solution of resorcin dissolved in equal parts of alcohol and rose water.

MRS. M. M., Jackman, Maine.—You should have the hemorrhoids operated on at once. This is the only way to get rid of them permanently. Your "dizzy turns" are promably due to anemia and not to high blood pressure. Better take some good tonic after meals—such as Basham's mixture—in tablespoonful doses, well diluted.

MRS. J. E. D., Portland, Oregon.—The "ringing in the ears" is due to a catarrhal condition of the nose and throat, and is the forerunner of serious deafness if the condition is not remedied at once. Consult some good aurist and have proper treatment at once.

MRS. J. F. P., Lindsay, Okla.—Bronchial trouble combined with an asthmatic condition has no relation to tuberculosis, in the main. Have your daughter take, after meals, one-half teaspoonful of pertussin. At night, also, apply a mustard plaster to the chest for a few minutes, or long enough to produce a decided redness in the skin.

MRS. E. E., Grandin, Mo.—Apply a mustard plaster to the throat at night and take some good tonic. You are tired out and this condition is reflected in the throat. Rest all you can. Take a tablespoonful of Basham's mixure, well diluted, after meals. Your husband, for his rheumatic condition, will be benefited by taking five-grain tablets of salicylate of sodium after meals, and drinking plenty of good spring water.

MRS. L. K., Strathmore, Calif.—Not contagious; but a chronic inflammation of the uterus and adnexa. Douche the vagina twice a day with normal saline solution—about a teaspoonful of table salt to the pint of very hot water. You might also, if this does not help you, have the uterus curetted.

MRS. J. H., Phillips, Wisconsin.—Pain in the left side is, as a rule, not due to appendicitis. You may have some form of ovarian irritation. Apply at night, over the ovarian region, tincture of lodin. Do not apply the tincture too often—once or twice a week will do.

MRS. F. W. L., Ferndale, Wash.—The cause of the itch is the "itch mite." You should scrub the parts that itch, especially the furrows where the mite burrows, with the tooth-brush, and apply at night sulphur ointment. Repeat this for three nights. Burn all the clothes you have been wearing that come in contact with the skin. Wear clean underclothes daily, as the mite also gets in the underclothes and re-attacks the body.

MRS. J. S. D., Tucker Hill, Ala.—Your father probably, besides the high blood pressure, has an acute indigestion with formation of gas. High blood pressure comes from a variety of causes. Excessive use of intoxicants, eating too rich foods, taking too little exercise, are among some of the contributing causes of so-called high blood pressure. A ten-drop dose of saturated solution of iodide of potassium, is one of the best remedies for this condition. Have your father take this remedy, in the dose indicated, three times a day, after meals, well diluted. Also have him take a half-teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda well diluted, between meals, for the stomachic acidity.

MISS N. C., Mulberry, Ark.—Have the warts removed by the actual cautery. This is the only way of removing them with any degree of certainty, and also with the certainty of there remaining no scar.

MRS. M. M. W., S. C.—Indigestion due to nervousness causes both the night-terrors and the heart to skip one or more beats. Take, after meals, a compound bicarbonate of soda tablet, and avoid sweets of all kinds, including pastries.

MRS. H. P., Sno, Wyoming.—Have your husband stop using cigarettes and take 1-60 gr. tablets of strychnia sulph., after meals. The night sweats are due to his impaired physical condition due to the excessive use of cigarettes.

MR. D. S., Harrisville, Mich.—For the high blood pressure take ten drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals. Of course avoid sweets or pastries of all kinds.

MRS. E. L., Cuyahoga, Ohio.—Have your sputum examined and find out whether or not you have tuberculosis.

MRS. P. W., West Hawley, Mass.—If you have the lung condition, you should rest most of the time and avoid exercise of any kind. Better find out if you really have tuberculosis by having the sputum examined at once.

MRS. F. Q., Poplar, Mont.—An aural abscess is always dangerous. You should have the ear treated at once by some good ear surgeon and have the discharge stopped and the condition relieved.

MISS M. L., Torrington, Ct.—The only sure symptom of tapeworm is the passing of a portion in the stool. The remedy for this condition is oleoresin of aspidium taken according to directions given in the September number of COMFORT.

LITTLE SNAPS MADE BIG!

Send COMFORT Your Developed Films. We Will Have Them Enlarged For You Free!

HAVE you a photograph that you prize most highly—a small one, perhaps, of Father, Mother, Grandma, or the baby; a dear relative or friend; some of Dad's prize livestock; the children at play; a picnic party, school or church gathering; the old home place, or maybe a snapshot taken while visiting some interesting or historic spot? And wouldn't you like to have it enlarged to a fine big picture that can be framed and hung on the wall?

If you will send us the developed film (negative in accordance with one of the offers printed below, we will have a beautiful silver-tone enlargement of it made for you free of all cost. You can have as many enlargements as you wish, all of one, or of different pictures. The work will be done by an expert photographer who uses the latest improved methods. Please note that you are to send us the negative, or in other words, the film after it has been developed. Enlargements cannot be made from prints (the finished picture), neither would we advise you to send dry plates on account of the danger of breakage.

Your film must be quite sharp and clear, in other words, what is called a good picture, otherwise we cannot secure a satisfactory enlargement of it. We shall of course return your original film when we send you the enlargement, both carefully wrapped, by parcel post prepaid.

When sending your film or films state plainly what size enlargements you desire, inclosing films in the same envelope with your letter and remittance. Address, Picture Dept., COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

chair shut-in and have been for nearly six years and know what it means to be confined to the house and also what a joy a wheel chair brings to people who cannot walk. All who help secure even one wheel chair, through COMFORT or in any other way, cannot realize how much joy you bring to the poor shut-in who receives the chair. God alone knows how many heartfelt thanks are given to each one who helped secure it. If you want to get an idea of the value a shut-in places upon a wheel chair, just think deep and earnestly what you would take for the use of your feet and legs. A wheel chair is worth more than a thousand times what it costs to the one who has to spend his life in it. So, sisters, do all you can to secure wheel chairs for shut-ins, through COMFORT. No one will know how much comfort and joy dear old COMFORT has brought to the shut-ins alone besides being such a help and comfort to its many readers.

My friends gave me the money to buy my chair and I can never thank them enough. It has been a great pleasure to me. I hope God will bless them a thousandfold for each cent spent for the chair.

I read, tat, crochet, embroider and sew. I can run my sewing machine as I have use enough of my feet and ankles, although I have to be lifted to and from my chair. I am slow but I cut and make my own clothes and most of my mother's and my father's shirts.

I will tell you what I like best to read. The Bible then books of travel for I want to see our great world even though it be through books. I also like poetry. I used to like novels and stories but I do not care for them any more but I have learned many good lessons from stories and loved the stories in COMFORT best of all. I still love COMFORT.

If anyone cares to write to me or send a postcard (scenery preferred), I would certainly appreciate it and will try to answer all who enclose stamped envelopes.

Love to all. MISS MABEL MCCOMB.

LOS ANGELES, 330 EAST 63RD ST., CALIF.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORTLESS SISTERS:

COMFORT is my only safety valve, because it's the only means of answering the many sick brothers and sisters who wrote me after my letter appeared in July COMFORT. I had no idea so many read the Sisters' Corner! COMFORT truly is a wonderful paper and fills every need of the household.

I have answered hundreds but it is a physical impossibility to answer all, even with the aid of my trusty typewriter.

Here are answers to some of your questions.

Arizona has one of the best climates for tuberculars, provding they can live on air, which is dry and healthy, but there is little work. Summers are hot. Winters delightful. The Hot Springs I mentioned in Arizona are only for rheumatism and neuritis, not for stomach trouble, old sores, pyorrhea, etc. For these there is a mineral mined near Phoenix, however, and is used just as it comes from the earth. Many people go there for the benefit of this mineral and many marvelous cures have been made.

I've known many to be cured of tuberculosis there. I was cured myself. Rest is essential as well as dry air and proper food. The climate will not do all.

California is a beautiful state. Flowers galore. Summers splendid. Winters foggy and wet. Some work in fruit and manufacturies.

How can the shut-ins pass the time? Cut clippings to send to some one who is ill. Choose some shut-in and make a correspondent of her or him, be a real help. Keep a diary, write a little in it each day. A common note book will do. Your friends and children will enjoy it in later years. Keep a note book handy and when you read something that especially impresses you, jot it down with the author's name beneath, it will be interesting to read over at intervals and to tell others. Read humorous books. Leave the weeps for the well folks. Jean Stratton Porter's books are like a ramble through the woods. I saw her in person recently. She is as sweet and motherly as one would expect her to be.

When I was convalescing I commenced a study course which I enjoyed immensely and am still profiting by it. Don't do this till you feel able, however.

Don't feel sorry for yourself. Every time you do you drive a spike in your coffin. Be cheery. Build aircastles and when you get well build foundations under them as I am doing. Think long thoughts while you are shut in with the world shut out. Remember, it's often at low tide that one picks up the things worth while. No one sympathizes with the sick more than I. May God bless you every one.

How shall I rear my children? I haven't space to tell you. Most of you know better than I, no doubt. Every child has its peculiarities. It also has its particular need. Learn the need of each age and meet it. Ages are divided into infant, beginners, primary, junior, intermediate and young people. Each is a distinctly different age from the other. Every child is a problem but remember, every problem has a solution and it usually takes study to solve problems. Study the child. Answer each question truthfully. It will save many a heartache. Tell them of God's plan for mankind very young. So young that it will cause no shock. There is much to be said but I have little space.

Girls ask, how can I have a room of my own when our house is small? There's the attic room, the den, the treetop nest, the nook in the woods. I haven't time to go into detail. Some time I may tell you how four of us girls solved the problem and each had a different kind of room for our very own although there "was no room in the inn."

Some have mentioned their COMFORT albums. Later I'll tell you of my snapshot books. My friends say they have never seen any like them and many of them are copying my idea. It's interesting work for the convalescent. Nature books, travelogues, etc., I have among my collection, made by my own hand.

I'm 36, and have one of the best husbands in "captivity."

We live within 115 miles of the ocean and from shells I have made portieres which my friends admire. Like Daniel Webster, I have been quite "wordy." Please don't write unless I can be of real help to you

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the months to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquois.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold and will which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The stones themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are imitations and perfect imitations of the real precious stones. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. Easy Now to Double Winter Egg Yield

Proven Remedy Gives Remarkable Results — Turns "Boarder" Hens Into Profitable Layers—

Winter egg yields, double and treble those of former years, are now being made by many poultrymen through the use of a compound that science has finally perfected.

This wonderful medicine, which is called "Hick's Egg-Lay," contains rare and expensive ingredients mixed so as to quickly increase the egg yield. The medicine acts on the reproductive organs and causes double and treble the usual number of ova (the germ cell of the egg) to be produced. Thus you get many more eggs and get them during the time they bring the highest prices.

Hick's Egg-Lay is prepared for convenience in tablet form. Simply dissolve one tablet in a quart of water. This is the surest, easiest and quickest way ever discovered to get more eggs.

A Trial Costs You Nothing

Mr. Hick is so confident that Hick's Egg-Lay Tablets will double and treble your egg yield that he is making a special guaranteed offer of one regular double strength $1.00 package of Egg-Lay Tablets and a full size $1.00 package of Hick's famous Lice-Go all for $1.00.

Lice-Go is added to the drinking water. The medicine taken into the system of the bird comes out through the oil glands of the skin and every louse or mite quickly leaves the body. Keeps the birds always free without the poultry raiser doing any work. If you would rather have two $1.00 packages of Egg-Lay Tablets or two $1.00 packages of Lice-Go instead of one of each, say so on your order. Send $1.00 today (currency, money order, check, etc.) to Chas. M. Hick & Company, Dept. 903, 1018 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Illinois. If you prefer, send no money. Just your name and address and pay postman $1.00 and postage on delivery. If after thirty days' trial, you are not absolutely satisfied, write Mr. Hick and your money will be refunded. This offer is absolutely guaranteed, so don't hesitate to make the test.

in the egg chamber. This high humidity also results in a better percentage of hatch, due to its effect upon the egg shell in making it thinner and more easily broken at hatching time. It is a good plan to insure this high humidity by sprinkling the eggs on the eighteenth or nineteenth day with warm water before closing the machine.

At hatching time the chamber should be darkened, thus keeping the chicks from trampling each other in an effort to get to the light. The quieter they can be kept the better. The chicks should be allowed to remain in the machine until they are thoroughly dry, which is from twenty-four to thirty hours after the hatch is completed. These few points in regard to the proper care of the eggs in the incubators are essential.

The greatest danger from overheating comes during the first few days of incubating. It is well to hold the temperature at the level of the tops of the eggs under 103 F. for the first week. I like to keep it at 102.

During the third week the animal heat exerts some influence, and 103 will be about right at the upper part of the egg.

While the chicks are hatching from the eggs, 104 may be registered at the level of the tops of the eggs. In some parts of our country, where incubators are operated at altitudes of several thousand feet, the temperature may be run a degree higher than I have indicated. At these altitudes, where the air is usually very dry, the matter of extra moisture supply becomes a very important item in successful incubation.

Ventilation Is Vital

During the early stages of embryo development in the egg, very little air is needed, because there is very little blood to be oxidized. During the second week there is increased blood circulation, and therefore need of some ventilation, so that the fresh air shall supply enough oxygen. All through the third week there must be abundant air supply, because at this period there is a very great circulation of the red blood, which must be continually using oxygen from the air. The pure air passes through the shell of the egg to the blood vessels that ramify all over the thinner lining of the egg. Carbon dioxide and moisture pass out through the shell.

If an egg chamber is poorly ventilated, the eggs should be aired once daily for a few minutes at a time, from the fourth to the twelfth day, and twice daily during the last week of incubation.

During the last few years, the agricultural colleges and experiment stations have been giving more and more study to the subject of moisture in incubation, until now it is generally conceded that it is quite as important as heat, and that a lack of sufficient moisture during the early days of incubation is frequently the cause of weakly, slow growing chickens. When one understands the process of development from the germ to the embryo chick and subsequent growth till it reaches the point where it breaks through the shell, there can be little doubt that we should give full attention to this point.

The white of a newly laid egg is largely composed of water, which keeps it in a liquid state. The shell of the egg being porous, allows this water to evaporate, and the white to become thick and sticky; if the egg is kept for any considerable time in dry air, it will all evaporate.

When the germ of the egg is quickened into life by the heat of the incubator, or under the hen, tiny veins run out into the white and absorb the water and certain nutriment, which is converted into the blood of the embryo and nourishes it during the building of its structure and the formation of its organs.

When an egg is put into an incubator situated in a dry room, and heated up to 102 or 103 degrees, the air in the machine must necessarily be dry, and the watery contingent of the white evaporates so rapidly that the embryo lacks blood and nutriment; with the result that when hatched it has weak internal organs, and can never become a really vigorous, profitable bird—like an egg producer or breeder. For this reason, the amount of moisture in the egg chamber is most important. Too much is as detrimental as too little.

Now we come to the question as to what is the correct amount, and how to gauge it. When a good hygrometer is used in the incubator, the attendant has only to read what it registers, just as he reads the thermometer to know the amount of heat which is present.

During the first week, the hygrometer should register 75 degrees; the thermometer 102 to 102½. Second week, hygrometer, 70; thermometer, 102½ to 103.

During the third week we have a changed condition of affairs. The small systems of blood vessels of the first week have vastly increased, so that by the fourteenth day the white of the egg is full of veins in which the blood is rapidly circulating, and the chick's body is growing fast. Bear in mind that the first ten days are devoted to development, and in that short time the chick is fully formed in all its parts. During this period the quantity of blood in circulation is comparatively small.

Then come the ten days of growth or increase in the size of the body and its parts, when great quantities of blood are rushing through the numerous blood vessels, carrying the building material. It is during this latter period that the water (after being used in the blood circulation) should be allowed to escape freely from the egg, with consequent rapid development of the air cell. Therefore, during the last week of incubation I would remove the wet sand or water pans from the egg chamber, and let the humidity decrease even to 50 degrees, or possibly 40 in some cases. Simply removing the extra supply of water usually answers the purpose.

The moisture supply must be renewed on the nineteenth day for another distinct purpose. If the air surrounding the hatching eggs is dry, the chicks are likely to have a hard time breaking through the shell.

It is quite an exertion for the chicks to pick their way out of the shell, consequently they should remain in the incubator at least thirty-six hours and be given time to rest and recover strength. If bacillary white diarrhea, which is transmitted to the chick by the mother hen, be present in any of the chicks, it will be voided in the droppings from the very first. To prevent the spread of this disease from chick to chick by the picking up of infected droppings, the incubator should be darkened as soon as the first chick is out, and be kept darkened until the chicks are removed to the brooder. There is very little danger of disease spreading by this means after the chicks are removed to the brooder and have a chance to take food into the system.

L. M. D.—This seems a hopeless case, if, as you say, two of the turkeys died soon after you got them, and then, as you informed me, the one that was marked as the tom never developed properly, and you seem convinced that the bird has laid several eggs, all of which goes to show that there must have been something wrong about the stock. As for the tom, there seems to be nothing to do but kill the bird, for no matter what the sex may be, the fact that the bird has fits, renders it useless as a breeder. If you do kill the bird, please give me a clear description of the condition of the heart, liver, lungs and intestines. I would also like to know if you raised any young ones this past season, and how many eggs the other two turkeys laid, if any.

F. M.—The guineas may have met with some accident, for as a rule, guineas are the hardiest birds in the poultry family, after they are once feathered out. Perhaps a roost has broken down with them, or some night prowler, like a coon or possum, may have grabbed them off the roost and wrenchd the hock joints. I am quite convinced that the birds' condition is the result of accident, not disease.

J. T. T.—Too much corn has upset the digestive organs and brought on liver trouble. You may be able to save some of the birds, by giving them free range, or if that is not possible, cover the floor of the henhouse or scratching shed with clean litter. Dry leaves or rye straw is the best. Scatter scratch feed, or a mixture of oats and wheat, broadcast, on the litter, so that they will have to scratch for every grain, and add a tablespoonful of Epsom salts to every quart of drinking water for two weeks. At noontime feed green vegetables of some sort. Cabbages, hung up by the roots about fifteen inches above the ground, would be the best, for then the birds would have to jump up each time they picked at them, and that would give them additional exercise, which is what they specially want until some of the internal fat is removed.

A. C.—From your description, I fear that the birds are suffering from roup, which is very contagious, and passes rapidly from bird to bird. As soon as any bird shows a sign of the disease, separate it from the flock, and keep it in a coop as far away from the rest of the poultry as possible. Unless the disease was introduced by some strange bird, the outbreak has developed from a neglected cold. Without knowing more about the situation and condition of your chicken house, I can't say what caused the trouble. The house may be damp. Is the land well drained? Or there may not be sufficient entilation to carry off the moisture caused by the birds' breath and the heat of their bodies during the night. Or it may be a window or door does not shut tightly, and a draft may strike the birds when they are on the roost. Look the house over and try to decide the cause for yourself. Remember, plenty of fresh, cold air never hurts birds, but a draft through a crack or knothole almost always causes trouble. Dissolve a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in half a pint of water, agitate until thoroughly mixed, and for use dilute two tablespoonfuls of the mixture with two tablespoonfuls of water. Fill a small syringe and spray the bird's throat, nostrils and eyes twice a day. If you have no syringe, you can do the work fairly well by dipping the end of a soft wing feather into the solution.

AMBOY, R. R. 1, BOX 62, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I wonder if any of you ever make corn husk mats? They are handy to put on the porch in front of the door.

Gather fresh, clean corn husks from ripened corn, a sackful or two, as it takes a good many. Take three or four pieces of husks in left hand for each strand. Tie tightly with cord, divide strand, take three or four more pieces of husks with stiff ends up, and lay on strand so stiff ends stick up about one and one-half inches, bring a strand over it to hold it in place. Take more husks and lay on strand just brought over, now bring the next strand over that. Keep doing this until you have a bristly rope several yards in length. As you add your pieces of husks each time it makes your strands a little longer, so you can keep braiding. The bristles will all come on top, the under side will be smooth. Take your braided husks and sew them as you would a braided rug, being careful to keep the bristles up. You can make your mat round or oblong and any size you wish. They are not so hard to make as they sound and will last a long time.

Flour sacks are popular and I have found a use for them that I think is new. I take a set-in screen from window, baste flour sack onto it and put it back into the window. This way one can have their windows up all winter with fresh air and light but no draft.

Maxine Phyllis is a happy looking little girl. Babies in our corner are an added comfort.

I would be pleased to hear from some of the sisters.

MRS. RALPH HOWARD.

DOWNEY, R. R. 1, BOX 82, IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Having read Troubled's letter in September COMFORT I decided to send her some advice which may help her to get along with her disagreeable sister-in-law.

The next time your sister-in-law comes over, don't give her a chance to complain, but start in complaining over everything she does and has, even go to her house and find fault; tell her that her new hat isn't becoming and ask if she couldn't have gotten some other color. Be sure to find fault with her little girl's clothes as well as her own. Complain over everything she cooks. Compare her cooking with some other person's (not your own) by telling her how much lighter their bread and cakes are. Make an example of everything she does. Complain about the arrangement of her furniture, and that her floor coverings do not match the walls and if her walls are painted, tell her that paper looks nicer. When you make comparisons always use for your examples people with plenty of money.

Unless this is a very stubborn case, a dose of your sister-in-law's own medicine ought to prove a most effective cure.

Will be glad to hear from any who care to write.

Best wishes to all. MISS STELLA PRATT.

TUSKEGEE, ALA.

COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to thank each and every one who sent the song, "Charles Geteau." I was glad to receive it and have been able to pass it on to others. I enjoyed the letters, too, that came from every part of the country. Thank you again. MRS. W. C. BENTLEY.

OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have read with interest the letters on children. As I am the mother of two I surely appreciate all hints and helps along that line. My mother had COMFORT in the home when I was a small child.

Mothers who are troubled with your baby being constipated, try this. Give a teaspoonful of milk of magnesia in each bottle until relieved and then gradually diminish the amount. I had lots of trouble with this when I had to wean my baby and put him on the bottle. The cow's milk made him constipated and nothing seemed to do any good until I used milk of magnesia and it was a long time taking effect in his case but I've never had any trouble since.

One mother asked why the stools of her baby turned the diapers pink? The opinion of one doctor is that the baby does not get enough water. Be sure and give baby plenty of fresh water.

One thing I think one should be careful of in weaning a baby is this: Many times I think the mother tries to wean baby in too big a hurry and does not get the baby in the habit of drinking milk from a cup and so breaks him of the milk drinking habit. I know of several cases where this has happened.

Young mothers, don't make the mistake of trying to do too much, working beyond your strength, to save expenses, when you have a nursing baby. Of course one in moderate circumstances has much to think of and plenty of expenses at that time. I know, for I've been through it but rather let some of your housework go if you can't afford help and have too much to do for yourself. If you don't, you will always have a tired, cross, fretful baby. Save your strength for your baby.

MOTHER OF TWO.

SOMEWHERE IN CALIFORNIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND THE COMFORT SISTERS:

First I must say that I think COMFORT a wonderful magazine. I remember seeing it in my grandmother's house, and mother took it and I hope to for I enjoy it far more and get more help and real comfort from it than I do from other magazines costing much more.

This is my first attempt at writing a letter and I won't feel badly if it isn't in print, because Mrs. Wilkinson just has to pick out the best of all she receives.

I thought I would write and tell what a crowd of us girls used to do before I was married. There were twenty or more living near each other so we could meet one evening each week for a sewing circle. Some girls attended high school, others worked, so we voted and decided on the night most convenient for the largest number. We met quite early so as to have a long evening and still be home and in bed before it was late. If one girl lived a long distance away, three or four would go out of their way to go home with her, particularly if she lived in a section that was not thickly settled. We served refreshments, just two things being allowed, and we took turns in meeting at the different homes. Sometimes an elderly woman who enjoyed the company of young folks would invite us. In our crowd was one girl who did not like to sew, but she liked to read aloud so we enjoyed many good books while we sewed. Sometimes we helped others instead of doing our own sewing. If there is an orphans' home near you they probably would appreciate some help, as we did quite a bit of sewing for one. And perhaps a busy mother needs some help. And at Christmas time you surely know of some unfortunate child or children you can make happier. Just a few ideas as to what you can do to help others and still have a pleasant night a week. This was some time ago but I often look back

117 Eggs Instead of 3!

One of our readers says, "'More Eggs' increased my supply from 3 to 117 eggs." You, too, can reap bigger profits than ever, by making sure of a big egg yield this winter. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "MORE EGGS". Give your hens a few cents' worth of "MORE EGGS" and you will be amazed and delighted with results.

More Eggs Tonic keeps hens in the best possible laying condition. It is a concentrated tonic, not a food. It contains every element that helps make eggs.

Start using More Eggs Tonic right now. Keep your hens laying right through the coldest weather when eggs are highest. You can get big profits from your hens this winter, just as hundreds of other More Eggs users are doing.

1500 Eggs in 21 Days

"Dear Mr. Reefer: I have fed two boxes of More Eggs to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 white Leghorn hens and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs."—H. M. PATTON.

Hens Lay All Winter

Results tell the story. Here are just a few letters from poultry raisers who are getting more eggs and more profits through the use of Reefer's MORE EGGS Tonic.

Gets 132 Eggs on December 1

"Dear Mr. Reefer: Sometime ago I got some of your More Eggs and it meant MORE EGGS. I am now fully convinced of its utility. I have 14 pullets and 14 hens one year old, and the first 10 days in December they layed 11 dozen eggs."—H. F. POHLAND, President Citizen's Bank, Ashland, Ore.

Moulting Hens Lay 200 Eggs

"Dear Mr. Reefer: From the 21st of November to the 7th of December, my 36 hens have moulted and laid 200 eggs. Your More Eggs Tonic is fine and I never will be without it in my home."—F SHAW.

48 Dozen in One Week

"Dear Mr. Reefer: I can't express in words how much I was benefited by answering your ad. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some and had 1½ dozen left."—MRS. LENA McBROOM.

Let Us Give You This Fruit And Flower Garden!

WE have made a new arrangement this season with a well-known nursery company, whereby we can now offer our readers a complete fruit orchard and flower garden consisting of some of the finest apples, pears, berries, grapes and ornamental shrubs grown. The stock will be sent to you direct from the nursery in Michigan by parcel post prepaid. We guarantee that it will reach you in perfect condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. If for any reason any of the trees, bushes, vines or shrubs should fail to meet with your expectations we will replace them for you free of all charge.

ALL of the grape vines, raspberries and dewberries in these Collections are healthy, well-rooted year-old plants. They should bear fruit the second year. The apple and pear tree grafts are made from heavy one-year-old roots and scions of this year's growth. They should grow from four to six feet the first year. The shrubs are one year old and should bloom the first year from planting. With each Collection you will also receive full instructions on planting, pruning, and the care of fruit and shrubs, what fertilizer to use and the kind of soil best adapted to the production of heavy yields. Just read what these big Collections contain.

6 Year-Old Grape Vines

Collection No. 8761 These are not "calloused cuttings" but heavily rooted year-old vines, guaranteed to live and bear fruit the second year. They will grow anywhere in the United States. With these six vines in your yard or garden you will soon have all the table grapes you can use and many more besides, to sell or to give away to your friends. This Collection contains the following varieties:

Two Moore's Diamond A well-known variety that produces immense clusters of grapes, yellowish white in color and similar to the Concord in shape of bunch and flavor. It is very hardy and a thrifty grower, making an unusually good vine for arbor or trellis. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

Two Concord This famous variety is the finest purple grape ever grown. They are large, luscious and juicy and so sweet that little or no sugar is required in making grape juice and jelly. Each one of these vines should produce a bushel of choice grapes in a single season. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

Two Worden Always a favorite, this variety yields large, well-shouldered clusters of deliciously sweet, highly-flavored fruit. Grape juice and jelly made from this grape is of a peculiarly spicy flavor that is relished by all. It is also one of the finest table grapes and a good shipper. It ripens two weeks earlier than the Concord. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

7 Flowering Shrubs

Collection No. 8781 There is nothing that will improve the appearance of your home more than these beautiful ornamental shrubs and vines. From earliest spring until late fall there is not a day but one or more of these shrubs are in bloom. They are field grown, one year old, well rooted and about one foot high when you receive them. This Collection contains the following varieties:

One White Flowering Dogwood—one of the earliest spring bloomers, Two Roses of Sharon—bearing a profusion of large double blossoms from August until late fall, Two Golden Bell—bears tiny bell-shaped yellow flowers, One Hall's Japan Honeysuckle—an ornamental climber with fragrant blossoms, and One Spirea Van Houttei—an early bloomer famed for its handsome foliage and clusters of pretty white flowers. You get these seven ornamentals (five different varieties) in this Collection.

8 Apple And Pear Grafts

Collection No. 8751 Think of the value of an orchard of these eight thrifty, healthy trees. Think how soon they will be yielding bushels of the finest apples and pears grown. With the heavy root system on these grafts they should grow from four to six feet the first year. This Collection contains the following varieties:

Two Delicious The finest winter apple grown, a heavy yielder, and ripens early. The fruit is medium large, delicious in flavor and colored a beautiful red. This variety always sells for the highest market prices as it keeps well and retains its crisp, firm white flesh to the end. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Wealthy A hardy Russian fall apple with deep red and bronze streaked skin. The flesh is firm and crisp, the flavor sweet yet tart. For both eating and cooking it has few equals and is one of the most profitable apples grown. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Jonathan This apple ripens in October and because of its juicy, winy flavor is considered one of the best eating apples on the market. It is red in color with a smooth, waxy skin. You will enjoy gathering the huge crops that this variety invariably yields. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Bartlett Pear One of the best-known varieties, more largely grown than any other. You are probably familiar with its yellow skin with its pronounced red blush, and its sweet, juicy flesh of a delightfully spicy flavor. This variety makes the best table pear, being very mellow when ripe and always yields a heavy crop. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Our Free Offer!

FOR only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you any one of these Collections free by parcel post prepaid. For two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you any two Collections—for three one-year subscriptions any three Collections—and so on. When ordering please be sure to mention the number of each Collection wanted.

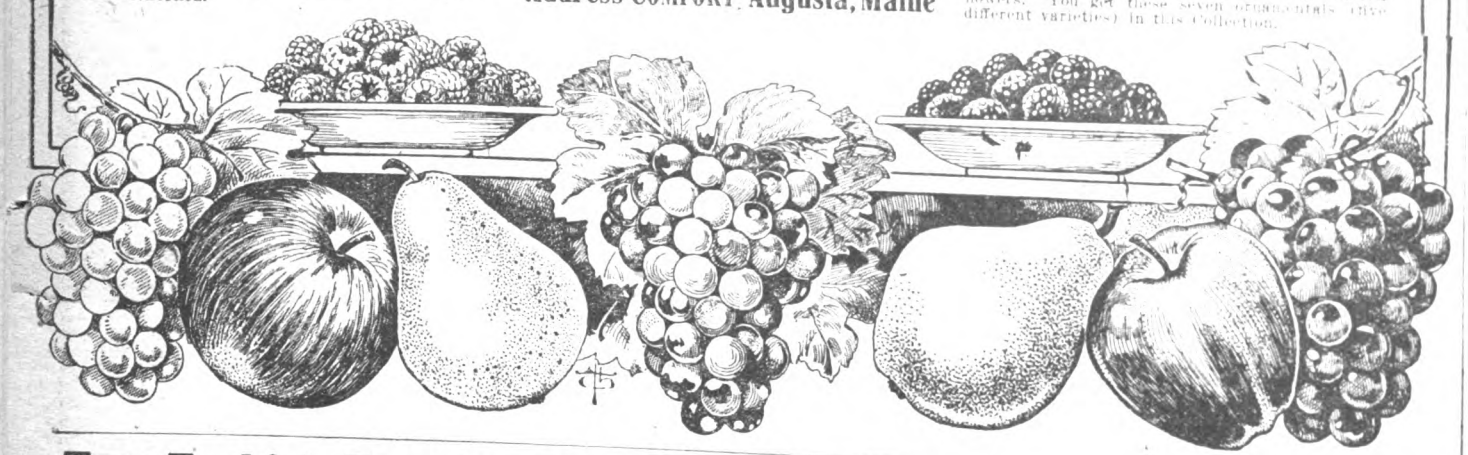
8 Luscious New Fruits

Collection No. 8771 Your garden is not complete without berries and in this Collection you will receive three of the finest varieties grown. For the table, for the most delicious jams, jellies and preserves, they are unexcelled. Each plant is one year old with strong, healthy roots. The Collection contains the following varieties:

Four Lucretia Dewberry A vigorous grower that attains such size that the support of a trellis is really needed. The vines are literally covered with immense clusters of delicious wine-flavored berries, averaging one and one-half inches in length, very sugary, remarkably juicy and having but a few fine seeds. You get four of these year-old vines in this Collection.



Two Red Raspberry This variety (St. Regis) is the finest everbearing red raspberry. The bush is a rapid grower, bearing fruit ten days earlier than most other varieties and continuing to bear throughout the summer and fall. The fruit is large, of delightful flavor, sweet and very juicy, and ripens in large clusters. You get two of these year-old bushes in this Collection.

Two Black Raspberry This variety (Black Diamond) is named from its habit of fruiting in large clusters. The berries are of good size, remarkably sweet and juicy, but firm in texture. The canes grow rapidly and are very tall and upright. Its distinguishing feature, however, is its immense yield which together with its fine quality make this the most desirable garden and market berry. You get two of these year-old bushes in this Collection.

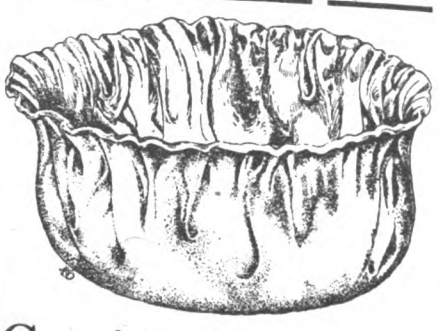
Collection No. 8791 With one exception this Collection is different from Collection No. 8781, although comprising shrubs which bloom from spring until late fall. All of them are field grown, one year old, well rooted and about one foot high when you receive them. In this Collection you will receive the following varieties:

Two Roses of Sharon, One Snow Ball Hydrangea—a midsummer bloomer bearing immense quantities of snowy-white blossoms, One Purple Lilac—its fragrant purple flowers need no description, Two Thunberg Barberry—fine for a hedge, bearing pretty red berries which stay on all winter, and One Trumpet Vine, a hardy climber for porch or arbor, bearing throughout summer and fall large clusters of orange-colored flowers. You get these seven ornamentals (five different varieties) in this Collection.

Two Turkish Towels



Good Size Soft And Fleecy

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite as fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bathroom, guestroom or everyday family use. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the soft fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being. They are also fine for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels offered here are 15 inches wide and 32 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use, and are of good weight, well made and finished. We will make you a present of two of these towels upon the terms of the following offer

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you one pair (2) of these fine Turkish Towels free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 9912.

Silver Bonbon Dish

Genuine Gold Lined

THIS beautiful dish can be used for a variety of purposes—for candy, nuts, salted peanuts, popcorn, etc. It is much larger than it appears in the above illustration, measuring over five inches in width and two inches deep. It is heavily silver plated outside and gold lined. Needless to say, it makes a handsome ornament for the sideboard and will last a lifetime.

We will send you this handsome Silver Bonbon Dish free upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this Silver Plated, Gold Lined Bonbon Dish free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9942.

The Latest Vanity Case

For A Club Of Two

EVERY woman and girl who likes to keep up with the styles should have one of these handsome, embossed silver finish Vanity Cases. It is the very latest design, having a thin model case like that of a thin model watch, is very light, weighing a little over two ounces, and of good size—3¾ inches long and 2½ inches wide. The chain is twelve inches long. Inside the case is a fine little mirror and two dainty powder puffs. This new Vanity Case is one of the prettiest designs we have yet seen so we have purchased a quantity of them to give away among COMFORT readers. We will send you one free if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this Vanity Case free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 1152.

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7625.

French Ivory Manicure Set In A Roll-Up Leather Case

Given For A Club Of Four

A PRACTICAL and beautiful Set, containing everything necessary for the proper care of the nails. It consists of a 5-inch flexible polished steel nail file, a pair of 3½-inch polished steel curved nail scissors, a 4-inch cuticle knife with French Ivory handle, a 4-inch French Ivory nail stick, and a 4½-inch nail polisher or buffer with French Ivory Top. All these articles are neatly contained in a moire-lined, genuine leather case, measuring 6½ inches wide and 6 inches from end to end when opened. The case rolls up as shown in illustration, and fastens with two snap clasps. In this form it resembles a miniature pocketbook, and is just as convenient to carry, as it measures only 5½x2 inches and only 1 inch in thickness.

Although we offer this Manicure Set for an unusually small club, please understand that each and every piece is strictly high grade and regulation size. We know that every woman and girl who accepts this offer and earns one of these splendid Sets will be more than delighted with it. It is free on the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this splendid French Ivory Manicure Set in a roll-up leather case free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9191

This Beautiful Crystal Necklace

Topaz
Amethyst
Emerald
Sapphire

For A Club Of Only Two!

RIGHT from New York, the center of fashion, comes this new, stylish necklace and we were indeed fortunate in obtaining a good supply of them. We only wish we could show it in its actual colors because mere words fail to do it justice. It is thirty inches long, composed of brilliant crystal cut beads, alternating with seed beads, with transparent long oval and round bead ornamentations and tassel. It comes in four different colors—Topaz, Amethyst, Emerald and Sapphire.

City people of course have no difficulty in obtaining the newest styles in necklaces. But COMFORT'S women and girl readers live in the country, far from the up-to-date stores—and that's why we make this offer. This is your opportunity to secure a necklace as handsome and stylish as any that will be seen anywhere this season. And best of all, it will not cost you one cent if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this beautiful crystal bead necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 1142.

Home-made Remedy Stops Coughs Quickly

The best cough medicine you ever used. A family supply easily and quickly made. Saves about $2.

You might be surprised to know that the best thing you can use for a severe cough, is a remedy which is easily prepared at home in just a few moments. It's cheap, but for prompt results it beats anything else you ever tried. Usually stops the ordinary cough or chest cold in 24 hours. Tastes pleasant, too—children like it—and it is pure and good.

Pour 2½ ounces of Pinex in a pint bottle; then fill it up with plain granulated sugar syrup. Or use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup, if desired. Thus you make a full pint—a family supply—but costing no more than a small bottle of ready-made cough syrup.

And as a cough medicine, there is really nothing better to be had at any price. It goes right to the spot and gives quick, lasting relief. It promptly heals the inflamed membranes that line the throat and air passages, stops the annoying throat tickle, loosens the phlegm, and soon your cough stops entirely. Splendid for bronchitis, croup, hoarseness and bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of Norway pine extract, famous for healing the membranes.

To avoid disappointment ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with directions and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Do you want "Mary Ann?"

She is just a big, fine, darling doll every girl's heart is hungry for. Mary Ann will come to you without costing one cent. She wants a play mother to walk with her, sing to her when she cries, rock her to sleep.

Mary Ann Can Walk—Cry Sleep—Wink

Her brown hair is soft and silky. Jointed arms and legs, bright blue eyes that sleep. Cries when you lay her down or take her up. Unbreakable head, eyes won't jar loose. Cute silk cap, pretty figured lawn dress, stockings, patent leather slippers.

13 Inches Tall

WALKING DOLL

She is YOURS for doing me a little favor I will send a Mary Ann doll just as described above in return for a small favor. Just write me today and I will tell you how to get her without cost. Send name and address and say "I want Mary Ann."

She Is Looking For A Mother

Do You Want Her?

"Peggy" The New Winter Doll

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Ivory Boudoir Clock

For A Club Of Eight

FOR sleeping-room, living-room or desk this white ivory clock is not only a beautiful ornament but a reliable timekeeper. It is 3½ inches high, with a 3¾-inch base and pure white dial with large, easily-read figures. It is fitted with an American movement, fully guaranteed. The design is one of the latest styles that are now being showin in all the leading jewelry stores of the big cities.

We guarantee you will be pleased with this clock as well as surprised to learn that we can give such a splendid value in return for so few subscriptions. Buying in large quantities direct from the factory enables us to do it. We will give you this clock, exactly as described, free upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For eight one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this beautiful, white ivory clock free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7638.

on those two years with many pleasant memories. We always remembered the brides-to-be and helped them with their things and gave them a shower too. Married sisters, you can do the same, only meet once or twice a month, and spend the day with one another. Each bring something toward the lunch or each prepare the entire meal, as you choose. Your husband won't mind if you are away once in a while, if you leave a good lunch for him and get home in time to have a hot supper at night.

Our Sunday School class used to meet twice a month. One meeting would be held at a member's home where she served the supper and the next at the church where each one brought her share. I remember one time when one of the dearest mothers there is, sent lovely hot rolls by little brother, who, of course, was glad to do it. There was no dressing up allowed, as the majority came from work. Supper was served at six so to give plenty of time and the girls who didn't work came early and had things all ready.

How many of you that have good kind husbands appreciate them enough? When you are condemning him for some fault do you stop and think of yours? Maybe you have some as bad, or worse. If you have a good, kind husband, show him that you do. When he comes home, tired, how his eyes will brighten by a kind word, or perhaps his favorite pie for supper. It takes more than four walls to make a home.

With best wishes to each of you, I try to be

A HUSBAND'S PAL.

QUINCY, FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT ever since I was old enough for mother to read it to me.

I am quite small, weighing 110 pounds and am five feet, four inches. I have "cat's eyes," medium brown hair, sharp nose and a quick temper but am very affectionate. Am 21 years of age and married to the best of husbands. He is Supt. of the City Light Plant here. We have been married four years. I have a dear little stepdaughter, Catharine Ruth, aged six years. Ruth is perfectly devoted to me and I am to her. We get along just fine. She doesn't know but that I am her own mother and I try to treat her as I would my own child. Stepmothers, all of you, always think how you would like to have your child treated if it were left with a stepmother. I have no children living but I have a true mother's heart, and I had a stepmother. She was good to me and I love her but I can look back and see how I often treated her wrongly. I was fourteen when Papa married again. Others influenced me. Never encourage a stepchild to disrespect its stepmother for the stepmother has her ups and downs as well as the child.

My favorite flower is the narcissus. Nile green is my favorite color and as for my hobby—I love anything little, sweet and cute. My chickens get the most of my attention. I have a good many little chicks and white turkeys and they are beauties. I have a cow and we have al the milk and butter we need. Did you ever try buttermilk for little chicks? It is fine, and I use grits or hominy, as some call it, with a little milk, black pepper and chopped onion blades to feed them on also. I want pigeons, guinea pigs and rabbits. These I have already ordered. Next, a pair of Maltese kittens, a pair of peafowl, a pair of white guineas, a pair of bantam chickens, a pair of ducks, one canary, a pair of gold fish, a Newfoundland pup, a white lamb and a parrot.

I would like to hear from Miss Marguerite Grey and Miss Ora Lee Hicks if they happen to see this.

Love to all the sisters.

MRS. G. O. COX (NICKNAME GO C.)

Mrs. Cox.—Shall you name your home "The Ark" after you get all these many pairs of birds and animals?—Ed.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Pour boiling water on oranges and let them stand for five minutes. This separates the white lining from the skin and they will be easier to prepare for a pudding. —ALVINA POTTS, Loveland, Colo.

Add a little butter when making starch and it will not stick.—MRS. LAURA TRAVIS, Bluffton, Ind.

When darning large holes in stockings, first sew a piece of net over the hole and darn in the holes of the net.

When sewing, keep two spools of thread, one for the machine and one to put on to fill the bobbin. This saves much time in threading the machine.

On rainy days give the children the button box and needle and thread and let them string the buttons. This will keep them interested for a while. Then give them blunt-pointed scissors and old magazines and let them cut out the pictures.—MRS. S. B. THORNTON, Mt. Washington, Mo.

When sweeping a carpet, sweep the way the nap lies and keep your broom against the floor, that is, do not lift it up high at the end of each stroke, but keep it down and the dust will be driven before the broom and remain on the floor and not fill the entire room.

To keep the carpet looking like new go over it each week, after sweeping, with a cloth or large sponge dipped in water to which has been added one tablespoon each of salt and ammonia. Put salt in pail and add hot water to dissolve, then fill with cold and add ammonia. Wring cloth or sponge nearly dry.

To wash windows, put a teaspoonful of ammonia in a pail of water and wash with a sponge, then polish with a chamois before quite dry.—MRS. ALLIE CROWLEY, Eureka, Calif.

The quickest way to pluck a goose or duck is to hold the bird in a pail of water, at boiling point. Then quickly roll it in a blanket and hang it up for ten minutes. The feathers will then come out very easily.

When seeding raisins or fruit, it helps to keep a pan of water near so as to dip the fingers in it as they become sticky.

A level teaspoonful of cayenne pepper or dry mustard mixed with the chicken mash once or twice a week is not only a tonic but aids in egg production in cold weather.

Canned cherries make delicious shortcakes as well as pies.—BERNICE HILL, North Conway, N. H.

It will prove a great saving if tubing is bought for pillow cases, then as the cases show signs of wear, rip or cut off the seams at the ends and fold again half way between the old folds. Sew up again and the cases will last almost twice as long.—MRS. J. Z. HANNA, Hemingway, S. C.

Use coal oil to remove chewing gum from most kinds of cloth and wood.

Use a baby carriage on wash day for carrying clothes to and from line. If baby cries, take him with you. —MRS. JOHN WARD, Harwood, Texas.

Use a paint brush for sweeping the stairs and the work will be more quickly and thoroughly done.

A little salt sprinkled in the frying-pan before frying fish will prevent fish sticking.—BLANCHE FOUNTAIN, Des Moines, 933, 63rd St., Iowa.

Don't discard faded rugs, dye with your favorite dye and they will look like new. Dissolve dye in a basin of boiling water and apply while hot with a paint or clothes brush. Two or more colors can be combined.

Save your little boy's worn-out caps and rip up and use for pattern and make his caps from your husband's worn-out trousers, putting cardboard in the visor. —TEXAS BLUE BONNET, Georgetown, Texas.

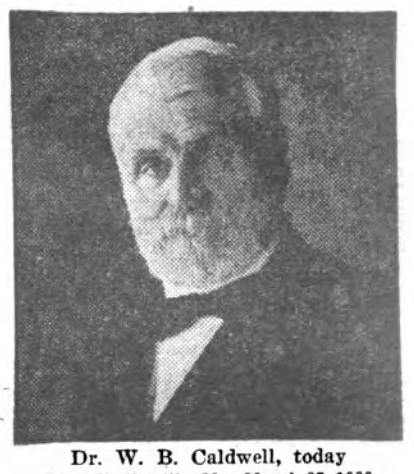
$10,000 Worth of Syrup Pepsin Free



I will give away this amount of money in my own medicine —There is a free trial bottle waiting for every family that has a sufferer from constipation —Send today for your bottle

TO commemorate my 84th birthday I have set aside $10,000 in cash to be expended entirely on free trial bottles of my Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which as people know has been successfully used for over 30 years and is today the largest selling family laxative in the world. In spite of that fact there must be literally thousands of families who have never tried it, and these are the ones I hope to reach with my $10,000 offer.

I want to prove to them that my Syrup Pepsin is a better-acting, safer, finer laxative than any other they can obtain. But I don't want them to be at any expense in trying it, and hence I offer a test bottle free. Later on, when thoroughly convinced of its unusual merits they can buy a bottle of their druggist. Over 10 million bottles of Syrup Pepsin are now sold every year in drug stores, yet my company will not profit one cent when you buy your first bottle. It costs us more to sell the first one than we get for it. Our profit comes only when a family keeps it regularly in the house, as I expect yours will when you are once convinced.

Many unthinking parents are giving children strong catharties; old people are taking salt waters and powders that make them dry and thirsty and which have to be repeated every day; women are using artificial coal-tar drugs in candy form that cause skin eruptions. Don't do it! See that only a plain vegetable laxative is used, not a druggy physic. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a vegetable compound of Egyptian senna and pepsin with pleasant-tasting aromatics. Just that! The formula is on the package.

I want you to have a free trial bottle of Syrup Pepsin in your home. I want you to share in my $10,000 offer. Yet

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, today
Born Shelbyville, Mo., March 27, 1839

I know if you delay answering you will be disappointed. Ask me now for the free trial bottle if anyone in your family has constipation, biliousness, flatulency, wind or gas on the stomach, sour colicky stomach, headache, loss of appetite and sleep, indigestion, intestinal poisoning, dyspepsia. Syrup Pepsin is intended for just such conditions. Watch it break up a fever or a cold!

Let me send you a trial bottle to prove these facts. My saying so won't prove it half as well as your trying it. Be one of the thousands who will use Syrup Pepsin free because of my 84th birthday. Send the coupon, or your address in any way most convenient to you. But do it quickly.

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 553 Washington St., Monticello, Illinois

In commemoration of your 84th birthday, and as my family has never used your Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, send me a free trial bottle to the address below:

Remedies

CONSTIPATION.—Take one-half pound black figs, one-half pound prunes and one-half carton of senna leaves. Wash figs and prunes and put all through food chopper twice so they will be thoroughly blended. Make into small balls, about the size of a walnut. Wrap in waxed paper and keep in jar with tight cover. Eat one at night. Give one-quarter of one-half to children.—MOTHER GOOSE, Curlew, Wash.

PNEUMONIA.—Take six large onions, chop fine, put in pan over fire, add same quantity of corn meal and vinegar enough to make paste; stir thoroughly and let simmer for about ten minutes, then put in two cotton bags and apply to chest as hot as can be borne. As soon as one cools, apply the other which has been kept hot in steamer. Keep changing, making fresh poultices from time to time. This cured my husband of pneumonia.—KENTUCKY MOTHER, Mt. Sterling, Ky.

ASTHMA.—Make a strong solution of saltpeter, saturate pieces of blotting paper in this and dry. When an attack is felt, light a piece of paper and inhale the smoke.

The block of granite which was an obstacle in the path of the weak, becomes a stepping-stone in the way of the strong.

Each ring is guaranteed sterling silver, with attractively designed open work, beautifully executed and finished. The imt. gems are perfectly cut, unusually deep, with that rare brilliancy so seldom found except in rings of the very highest quality. The twelve different gems and their corresponding months are as follows:

January, Garnet; February, Amethyst; March, Bloodstone; April, Diamond; May, Emerald; June, Agate; July, Ruby; August, Sardonyx; September, Sapphire; October, Opal; November, Topaz; December, Turquoise.

Heretofore the prices of solid silver rings have been too high to permit us to make an offer of this kind and it is only by a fortunate purchase of a large quantity of them taken in one lot that we are able to make the offer now. Don't delay if you want one of these handsome and stylish rings—we may not be able to secure any more of them at a reduced price. We will send it to you free if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you one of these Solid Silver Birthstone Rings, free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Beautify Your Home With These Magnificent Ever-Blooming Roses!

THERE'S no place like home—and no home as beautiful in summer as when surrounded with fragrant, luxuriously blooming roses. Why not plant some around your home this spring? Even if you now have a garden, you can find room for the five splendid bushes offered here—and they will cost you nothing. We buy these roses from the largest rose growers in the world. They are the finest that can be obtained. There are five different varieties in the assortment and each is absolutely the prize of its class, producing every month in the season an amazing profusion of large, magnificent blossoms, delightful in fragrance and of the most radiant colors. The bushes are one year old, strong, healthy, with well-formed roots. No matter where you live you will receive them at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five varieties given you on this offer. And please remember that with the bushes we are also going to send you complete directions for their planting and culture.

You Get One Each Of These Five Prize Beauties!

Mrs. Charles Bell One of the most beautiful and fragrant shell-pink roses ever introduced. It is a strong, vigorous grower and one of the hardiest of all bloomers. The flowers are faultlessly formed, extra large and double, and the abundance of bloom produced in one season is simply astounding.

Etoile De Lyon This magnificent bright sulphur-yellow rose is a fine forcer and an ideal variety both for cutting and garden purposes, being an exceptionally vigorous grower and prolific bloomer, bearing its flowers on strong, erect stems well covered with dark, glossy foliage.

W. C. Gaunt A rose of unusual individuality. Its color is a brilliant, velvety vermillion tipped with scarlet. The buds are medium long and pointed, the stems rigid, habit branching, with large, oval beech-green foliage. The fragrance of this rose is like tea and it is a rapid, vigorous grower.

Climbing Helen Gould There is probably no red rose so popular as the beautiful Helen Gould. It is now introduced for the first time in climbing form. Everybody is familiar with the warm watermelon-red color of its charming flowers. This is a grand climber, having none of the defects of the older varieties.

Snowflake A crowning masterpiece, with hardy, vigorous constitution, growing to perfection in almost any soil or situation. It has the most magnificent foliage and is a continuous bloomer of medium-size flowers, the beauty of which is nothing short of superb. Its color is pure white.

Our Free Offer For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you the above described five rose bushes (one each of the five varieties) free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8661. They will be mailed to you at the proper time for planting in your locality.

What A Beautiful Life-Like Doll For Some Little Girl In Your Home!

Won't She Fairly Shout With Joy When She Finds This Big, Handsome, Sleeping Dolly Is All Her Own?

OF course she will—no girl could help being delighted with this big, beautiful Dolly which is even more beautiful and lifelike than she appears in the illustration. It is a prettier and better doll even than we offered last season. And just think—a club of only six subscriptions to COMFORT brings her right to your door—yours to have and to own without one cent of expense. What a delightful surprise for some little tot in your home.

She Opens And Closes Her Eyes. She Has Real Teeth, Brown, Curly Hair And Wears A Pretty Dress With Hat And Real Stockings And Slippers.

NOW let us tell you more about this Doll. She is sixteen inches tall and jointed in such a manner that her arms, hands, legs and feet will stay in any position you place them. Her dark brown hair falls in bewitching curls, she has real teeth, her eyes are as blue as the sky and she opens and shuts them and goes to sleep like a real baby whenever you want her to. And she is always smiling and showing her pretty white teeth in a truly lifelike manner.

As shown in our illustration, she wears a very becoming hat trimmed with a large ribbon bow and a dress of the very latest style, with cute short sleeves, handsome figured lace and button trimmed waist and short skirt and she has on real stockings and slippers with silveroid buckles.

Fathers and mothers—just look at this beautiful Doll as she stands smiling and waiting for someone to pick her up, hug her and kiss her and take her out to play. Don't you think your little girl would just love to have her for her very own? Of course she would—and you should take advantage of this offer at once. Remember we have but a limited quantity of these Dolls on hand and when they are gone this offer will be withdrawn.

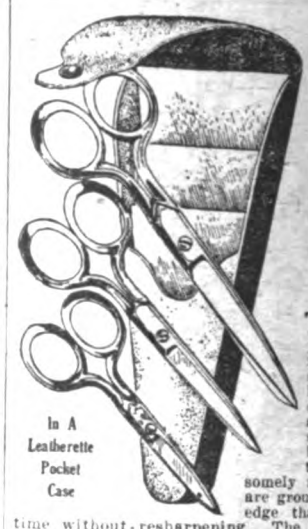
BOYS! Have Fun And Make Money With This Complete PRINTING OUTFIT

For A Club Of Only Two!

TOMMY Jones in the above picture is all smiles because he has printed some name cards for a neighbor for which he is to receive 50 cents. You can do the same. With this practical Printing Outfit you can print cards, tags, envelopes, small circulars, letter heads, bill heads, etc., and do the work well. There is always a demand for this kind of printing and if you are a "live wire" you can doubtless get a lot of jobs to do for your friends and neighbors and thereby earn considerable pocket money. And you will be learning something, too—typesetting, composition, correct use of capitals, punctuation, abbreviations, business terms and phrases—to say nothing of the fun you get out of it.

Everything in this Outfit is of the best quality. It contains one complete font of rubber type, or in other words, from eight to fourteen of each of the letters in the alphabet—both capitals and small letters; all the numerals from 1 to 10—two to three of each numeral—dollar signs, a full assortment of commas, periods, colons, semi-colons, hyphens, quotation, percentage and parenthesis marks, exclamation and question points, slugs, pointing hands and words and pharases most commonly used in business, such as "For Sale By," "Return To," "No.", "Co." etc. Then there is a four-line type holder, a pair of metal pinchers (to pick up the type with), and an everlasting ink pad in a metal case.

Parents should encourage their children in the use of this practical Printing Outfit, because it will furnish them with no end of fun, valuable instruction, and a chance to earn money of their own. Girls like this Outfit as well as the boys, and father and mother will also find it useful in the home in a hundred different ways.



We will give you this complete Printing Outfit free if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this complete Printing Outfit, exactly as described, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 1222.

Writing And Drawing Outfit

For Home And School

HERE is something that is needed in every home and by every schoolboy and schoolgirl—a big value-assortment of almost everything needed for writing and drawing. Our illustration is, of course, greatly reduced in size. The Case, which is made of fine leatherette, is 10½ inches long and 2½ inches wide. It is of the folding style, with a snap fastener, so that it can conveniently be carried in the pocket or in the children's lunch basket. Inside the Case there are three high-grade pencils with erasers, one good quality penholder with pen, one twin pencil (in reality two pencils in a combination holder), one pencil sharpener, one large rubber eraser, one 10-inch ruler and an aluminum collapsible drinking cup with cover.

This Outfit is manufactured by the American Lead Pencil Company, which is sufficient guarantee of its fine quality, and we know that it will please our readers, especially those who have children going to school, and of course it is just as handy in the home, because all the pencils, penholder, etc., are high grade and just what grown people like to use. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these fine Outfits free.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this complete Writing and Drawing Outfit, exactly as above described, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9972.

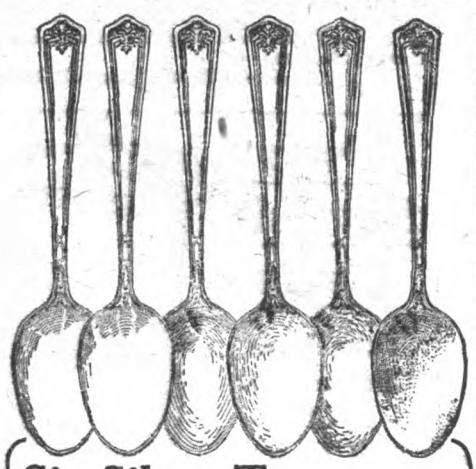
Hawk-Eye Camera



For A Club Of Six

THE "Hawk-Eye" is made by the Eastman Kodak Co., so it is hardly necessary to tell you that it is a high-grade camera—one that you can depend upon to produce the most pleasing and satisfactory results. The "Hawk-Eye" takes a picture 2¼x3¼ inches, is fitted with a reliable quick action lens, automatic shutter adapted for either snapshots or time exposures and has two brilliant view finders so that pictures may be taken either the long way or short way of the camera. It uses a film pack containing twelve films. This film pack can be put in the camera and taken out in broad daylight, thus doing away with the necessity of going to a dark room every time you want to load it. We know that there must be thousands of COMFORT readers, old and young, who have been waiting for just this opportunity to secure a real good camera without paying a big price for it so we are prepared to give away thousands of these "Hawk-Eyes" as club rewards. And remember, we send you not only the camera itself but also one film pack containing twelve films and an instruction book telling you all about picture taking from A to Z.

Given To You! For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this fine "Hawk-Eye" Camera with one Film Pack containing twelve films and complete Instruction Book free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 7866.

Six Silver Teaspoons

The Ever Popular "Avon" Design

BY buying in large quantities we are enabled to offer our readers this handsome set of six teaspoons for the ridiculously small club mentioned below. They are six inches long, made of pure nickel-silver, so there is no brass to show through, and they will never have that dingy or tarnished appearance even after years of constant use. The design is the beautiful "Avon" deeply embossed on the handles.

The rich design and splendid wearing qualities of these teaspoons combine to make this the most attractive premium offered in years. Our illustration does not do them justice. They must be seen to be appreciated. We know they will exceed your highest expectations.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you six of these fine Nickel-Silver Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 9682.

Sweet Grass Sewing Set

THIS attractive Sewing Set is the handiwork of the St. Regis Indians. They gather the fragrant sweet grass that grows so luxuriantly in the St. Lawrence Valley and from it weave the most beautiful baskets, jardinieres, fern dishes, centerpieces, table mats, vases, sewing sets, etc., doing the work entirely by hand, the only tool used being an ordinary knife.

Not only are these baskets and other articles very useful and ornamental but there is an indescribable charm in the delightful fragrance of the sweet grass from which they are made—a fragrance that is practically everlasting.

In this handsome sweet grass Sewing Set are a Scissors case, Thimble case and needle and pincushion. These are all tastily arranged and fastened together with pink silk baby ribbon as shown in the illustration. The ends of the ribbons are tied in a dainty bow, into which is sewed a white ivory ring, so that the complete Set can be hung on the wall or suspended from the sewing table, mantelpiece or chandelier.

We will make you a present of this useful and beautiful sweet grass Sewing Set if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For a club of only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this sweet grass Sewing Set, exactly as above described, free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 1252.

Poems Requested

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

The Rosary

BY ROBERT CAMERON ROGERS.

The hours I spent with thee dear heart,
Are as a string of pearls to me;
I count them over, every one apart,
My rosary.

Each hour a pearl, each pearl a prayer,
To still a heart in absence wrung;
I tell each bead unto the end, and there
A cross is hung.

Oh, memories that bless—and burn!
Oh, barren gain—and bitter loss!
I kiss each bead and strive at last to learn
To kiss the cross,
Sweetheart,
To kiss the cross!

The Mother Job

BY JANE BURR.

It really isn't hard to be a mother,
There really isn't very much to do,
The days are just exactly like each other—
You simply shut your eyes and wander through!

For six o'clock is time enough for rising,
And getting all the children washed and dressed,
And breakfast cooked—it really is surprising,
But mothers never seem to need a rest.

The lunches must be packed and jackets rounded,
And everybody soothed and sent to school,
To say that mother rushes is unfounded—
She's nothing more to manage, as a rule.

Unless it is to finish piles of sewing,
And cook and wash and iron and scrub and sweep,
To order food and keep the furnace going—
And then, perhaps, to hide herself and weep!

And when at last she's tucked them under covers,
And seen to doors that Dads forgot to lock,
Triumphantly, at midnight, she discovers
She's nothing more to do till six o'clock.

Sent in by a "Contented Mother."

Discontent

BY SARAH ORNE JEWETT.

Down in a field, one day in June,
The flowers all bloomed together,
Save one who tried to hide herself,
And drooped that pleasant weather.

A robin, who had flown too high
And felt a little lazy,
Was resting near a buttercup
Who wished she were a daisy.

For daisies grew so trig and tall!
She always had a passion
For wearing frills around her neck,
In just the daisies' fashion.

And buttercups must always be
The same old tiresome color;
While daisies dress in gold and white,
Although their gold is duller.

"Dear robin," said the sad young flower,
"Perhaps you'd not mind trying
To find a nice white frill for me
Some day when you are flying?"

"You silly thing," the robin said,
"I think you must be crazy;
I'd rather be my honest self
Than any made-up daisy.

"You're nicer in your own bright gown;
The little children love you;
Be the best buttercup you can,
And think no flower above you.

"Though swallows leave me out of sight,
We'd better keep our places;
Perhaps the world would all go wrong
With one too many daisies.

"Look bravely up into the sky,
And be content with knowing
That God wished for a buttercup
Just here, where you are growing."

For A' That And A' That

BY ROBERT BURNS.

Is there for honest poverty
Wha hangs his head, and a' that?
The coward slave, we pass him by;
We dare be poor for a' that,
For a' that, and a' that;
Our toil's obscure, and a' that;
The rank is but the guinea's stamp—
The man's the gowd for a' that.

What though on hamely fare we dine,
Wear hoddin gray, and a' that?
Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine,
A man's a man for a' that.
For a' that, and a' that,
Their tinsel show, and a' that;
The honest man, though e'er sae poor,
Is king o' men for a' that.

Ye see yon birkie ca'd a lord,
Who struts, and stares, and a' that-
Though hundreds worship at his word,
He's but a coof for a' that;
For a' that, and a' that,
His riband, star, and a' that;
The man of independent mind,
He looks and laughs at a' that.

A prince can make a belted knight,
A marquis, duke and a' that;
But an honest man's aboon his might—
Guid faith, he maunna fa' that;
For a' that, and a' that;
Their dignities, an' a' that,
The pith o' sense, and pride o' worth,
Are higher ranks than a' that.

Then let us pray that come it may—
As come it will for a' that,
That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth,
May bear the gree, and a' that.
For a' that, and a' that,
It's coming yet, for a' that—
When man to man, the warld o'er,
Shall brothers be for a' that!

A Mite Song

Only a drop in the bucket,
But every drop will tell;
The bucket would soon be empty
Without the drops in the well.

Only a poor little penny,
It was all I had to give;
But as pennies make the dollars,
It may help some cause to live.

A few little bits of ribbon,
And some toys; they were not new,
But they made the sick child happy,
Which has made me happy, too.

Only some outgrown garments;
They are all I have to spare;
But they'll help to clothe the needy,
And the poor are everywhere.

A word now and then of comfort,
That cost me nothing to say;
But the poor old man died happy;
And it helped him on the way.

God loveth the cheerful giver,
Though the gift be poor and small;
What doth he think of his children
When they never give at all?

a Snow or Wealthy and there a Fall Pippin or Vandeveer. And I would be sure to have at least ten trees of the Black Spitzenberg—an apple that seems never to be grown nowadays and whose yellow flesh and dark red skin has many times nestled against my teeth in the most delightful way. There may be some two-legged cider mill in the world who loves apples better than I do, Ila, but I never met that juicy somebody yet. This has been a great year for apples and so it has been a great year for your apple-loving Uncle. I think I have eaten about seven barrels to date, Ila. Included in these were some of the wild apples that grow ripe and flavorful when the frosts come to the upland pastures. These lonely trees have a thorny and difficult life of it, only comraded by rabbits, woodchucks, partridges and appreciative cows. A cow is one of the best judge of apples in the world, and can smell a ripe specimen of the fruit almost as far as I can. Ila, it seems to me you must have more orchards than you need; how would you like to trade one of the smaller ones for a lame typewriter, a too-talented Goat and a stack of receipted grocer bills? I'll even give some boot if there happens to be a Black Spitzenberg among the rows.

BETHEL, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

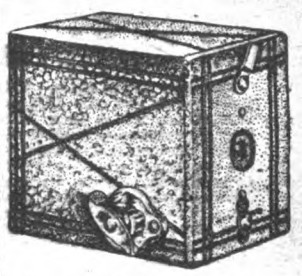
I'll tell you something about how I look first, maybe this will make it easier to get acquainted: Just picture me a common country lassie in a gingham dress. I have blue eyes and brown hair that is slightly curly. Although there's no dimple in my chin, there's one in each rosy cheek. They're the real stuff, Uncle, and didn't come from the drug store. Now don't take me for a fright, or for a beauty either. I'm neither one. I'm twelve years old, weigh 130 pounds, and am five feet and a half tall. Rather large for my age, am I not?

I started school this September as a freshman in high school at Bethel, a little town six miles away. I have a brother and sister who graduated in the class of '21. My sister will teach this winter near home. My brother is now at Newport, R. I., a tree surgeon. My two other brothers and I will drive to school in a Ford. One will graduate this year, the other is just starting in with me. There, that's enough about myself—too much, I'm afraid. Now for some other things.

The only fault I can find with COMFORT is that it doesn't come often enough, but mother says if it came oftener she would not get much work out of me for I love to read it so well.

I live on a farm of 200 acres, most of which is tended by my father and brothers. We can raise almost every crop here except those which need a warmer climate. Most of the hilly land is pastured by all domestic animals except goats (don't tell Billy!).

There, I must quit before my letter gets tiresome. Send my love to the cousins and keep a big share for yourself.



A Country Cousin, MARY LIMING.

Mary, I was glad to hear you did not purchase your dimples at a drug store. These boughten dimples are not at all dependable either as to shade or depth. I knew a girl here in Brooklyn who bought a bottle of Dr. David Doodad's Indelible Dimples. Because she wanted good deep dimples she foolishly rubbed on a double dose. The result was she awoke in the morning with a neat little round hole in each plump cheek—which holes she now has to keep plugged up with pink plaster of Paris so there'll be no draught on her back teeth. No, indeed, Mary; it is well for every girl to avoid getting her dimples in a bottle. If dimpleless damsels feel that these dainty dents must be artificially procured, it is much better to manufacture 'em by using a quarter-inch bit or a hammer and nail-set.

I'll say you're rather large for your age, Mary. With 130 pounds to your credit at twelve years of age, you should be quite substantial by the time you are twenty-four—provided you can maintain the same rate of growth. You ought to be fairly tall by that time, too.

Here's congratulations on your domestic dimple crop, Mary. If you think you really ought to have one of the cunning cavities in your chin, let that tree surgeon brother of yours have a try at the job of excavating. Anybody who can amputate the leg of a red elm with one hand ought to be able to put a dimple in a pink chin without half trying or even taking the edge off of any of his kit of tools.

Club Feet

Two brothers, Alton and William Livingston, both born with Club Feet, were treated at McLain Sanitarium with the splendid results set forth by their mother in this letter:

"I had two sons, born with Club Feet. Alton was treated at the McLain Sanitarium when three years old. The results were so entirely satisfactory that when William was born with Club Feet in January, 1921, ten years later, we took him to McLain's at 11 weeks old. In less than 8 weeks we had him back home with a pair of perfect feet. We are always glad to answer letters."

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for January

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Mrs. Willa Barber, Lamar, Mo. Unable to work and in constant pain for the past four years, this suffering woman worries greatly that she is unable to support herself as she has always done. Help her now when she is no longer able to help herself. Mrs. A. C. Hottinger, Hebron, O. Bedridden for 20 years, the case of this unfortunate is a particularly sad one. Cash will bring her some comforts and cheer. Ray Mills, Slocomb, R. R. 1, Box 38, Ark. This is an invalid boy of fourteen who asks for a postcard and letter shower. This boost should be easy to give. Lafayette Swanson, Boomer, R. R. 2, N. C. Dependent upon a sick wife for support, this man makes an urgent appeal for aid. He has been a shut-in, as helpless as a baby, for 20 years. Fred Bizzell, Newton Grove, N. C. Almost a lifelong sufferer from an incurable case of painful rheumatism. Well recommended and a worthy case. Miss M. Brackin, Bee Log, N. C. A woman of 52, struggling for own support. A needy and well-recommended case. Claude Shifflet, Richmond, R. R. 3, Ky. A helpless shut-in dependent upon a widowed mother for care and support. Dimes and greenbacks will help them both to carry on. A. B. Elrod, Fairmount, Ga. A man of 47, a lifelong invalid only able to walk with crutches. His efforts to aid himself make him particularly worthy of the help of others. Boost him along the happiness road. Lancelot G. Reeves, Toney Creek, R. R. 1, S. C. A poor crippled lad of fifteen who asks dimes and cheer. Give him his wish. Mrs. Alice Stacy, Varnells Station, R. R. 1, Ga. A widow with an invalid son. She faces a difficult winter without warm clothes or money to buy fuel. Well recommended. Susan Gilliam, Klondike, R. R. 1, Box 55, Tenn. This 74-year-old woman asks aid for her husband and herself. With four children dead, this poor couple are left to fight unaided. Winter clothing will aid—but greenbacks will give double warmth to age and suffering. Fulton R. Lowe, Sheppards, R. R. 1, Box 33, Va., sends grateful words of thanks to COMFORT readers who have sent him various forms of aid. Mr. Lowe is badly in want of winter underclothing.

Many of those listed this month hoped to have their names in the December issue of COMFORT, but I was sorry to have their appeals come in too late for such appearance. Yet if their Christmas was made the more sad because of this disappointment, let their New Year be the brighter! Give them a genuine start on 1923 that will carry them along a happier path of weeks and months for a while at least. Their road must be a hard and painful one at best. Let one of our New Year resolutions be to smooth it for them all we can!

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, as after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Six Wheel Chairs in December

663 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

I am pleased to close the Wheel-Chair account for 1922 with the announcement of six wheel chairs awarded and shipped in December, which brings the number of those sent out during the past year up to 41, and swells the grand total to 663 of these indispensable conveniences furnished to crippled shut-ins by COMFORT since the establishment of our Wheel-Chair department.

The recipients of the six December chairs are; Mrs. Mag Snodgrass, Powderly, Ky., 150; Miss Lucile Chapman, R. 1, Piedmont, S. C., 95; Auther T. Edmundson, Kenton, Tenn., 90; Mrs.

RUSSELL COCHRAN ENJOYING THE COMFORT WHEEL CHAIR.

Mayme E. Carter, R. 1, Troy, Ala., 87; Cleo Leverne Copple, 652 Virginia St., Hillsboro St., Hillsboro, Ill., 83; Raymond D. Ludvigson, Gunnison, Utah, 77. The figures following their respective addresses indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these applicants or by their friends for them.

Mrs. Mag Snodgrass, age 50, is afflicted with severe swelling of knee which is very painful. It is nearly two years since she became so crippled as not to be able to walk. Her trouble appears to be chronic. Her wheel chair will make her more comfortable and will be a help to her two children, on whom she is dependent, in caring for her.

Miss Lucile Chapman, age 20, for the past four years has been confined to her bed with rheumatism which has drawn her legs up so that they have to be supported by pillows as she lies on her back, the only tolerable position for her. Needless to say that she is a great sufferer.

Auther T. Edmundson, age 54, for the past twelve years has suffered from rheumatism which is growing worse. It is two years since he has walked and he is now nearly helpless as he has no use of his legs and little use of his arms. He lives with, and is dependent on, his married sister.

Mrs. Mayme E. Carter, age 41, is so crippled that she can not walk, and has been in this deplorable condition the past three years as the result of a severe burn. She has been to the Infirmary three times for treatment, the cost of which with other medical treatment has been a heavy burden on her husband and son. She hopes that her wheel chair will afford her some measure of relief.

Cleo Leverne Copple, age 12, has spinal weakness which affects her hips so that she can not walk, but she gets about to some extent by crawling like an infant. "So you see," as her mother writes, "the little girl needs a wheel chair."

Raymond D. Ludvigson, age 11, is paralyzed from his hips down, caused by nerve disorder, and, of course, has no use of his lower limbs.

The following letters of thanks and large Roll of Honor tell their own interesting stories.

I appeal to all you who are blessed with whole bodies and good health to help our Wheel-Chair Club to start the new year as beneficently for the shut-ins as it has closed the old year.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Enjoys Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

Delta, Colorado, R. 2.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I enclose a picture of Lillian Atchley which I hope you will publish so that COMFORT readers may see how she enjoys her wheel chair, for which she and her family are very grateful.

LILLIAN ATCHLEY ENJOYING HER COMFORT WHEEL CHAIR.

Lillian wishes to thank the good people who have writtn her for their kind letters, and to explain that the reason why she has not answered them is that she can not write because of rheumatism, and her mother is sick, but wishes to thank you and others who have taken an interest in Lillian.

Sincerely yours
(Mrs.) Mary Atchley.

COMFORT Wheel Chair a Great Help to Crippled Boy and to His Mother in Caring for Him

Roundup, Mont., Box 881.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am sending you a picture taken of Russell in his wheel chair, which we would be pleased to see in COMFORT. His chair is surely a great help to him and to us in caring for him. We feel now that we could not do without it, and we thank you and all who helped to get it for him.

Sincerely your friend,
(Mrs.) Earle Cochran.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions or amount of cash sent.

C., for General, $2.00; Carl Rhode, Mich., for General, $1.00; Mrs. Lizzie Draper, Ill., for General, $2.00; Mrs. Rachel McNeil, Ky., for Mrs. Mag Snodgrass, 150 subs.

Jenkins was sitting down to breakfast one morning when he was astounded to see in the paper an announcement of his own death. He rang up friend Smith at once. "Halloa, Smith!" he said. "Have you seen the announcement of my death in the paper?"

"Yes," replied Smith. "Where are you speaking from?"—Ladies' Home Journal.

FREE! COMFORT'S New Applique And Patchwork Book

WE have recently published a book of 32 pages showing nearly one hundred beautiful designs in applique and patchwork sent in by women readers of COMFORT.

These designs, which are handsomely illustrated and accompanied with full directions for making into bedspreads, shams, breakfast cloths, luncheon sets, scarfs, curtains, pillows, quilts, etc., etc., also blocks and sections for borders and conventional designs which can be used as appliques for various purposes among which are birds, tulips, daffodils, roses, baskets, morning glories, fleur de lis, peach, sunflower, star and crescent and others too numerous to mention. You will marvel at the beautiful work you can do with this book as your guide. The designs are attractive yet simple and easy to make, and as they were submitted by our own readers they are entirely different from any others you may have seen.

You can have a copy of this book free if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you this Applique and Patchwork Book free by mail postpaid.

Two Stylish Bags

Take Your Choice For A Club Of Four

HAND-BAGS are more popular than ever this season so we take pleasure in offering our lady girl readers either of the two handsome styles described herewith.

The Bag illustrated above (Reward No. 8581) is the newest "Kodak" shape, 6½x4¼ inches in size, made of genuine leather, pin seal finish, in a beautiful shade of brown. It has two large extension side pockets, a smaller pocket which holds a dainty mirror and a middle coin pocket with metal frame and mirror, and a small pocket which betweens together for the protection of small and valuables. It is nicely lined, closes with a nickel fastener and has a 13-inch leather handle.

The Bag illustrated at the left (Reward No. 8582) is 6¼x4¼ inches in size, made of pebble leather, morocco finish, color black. This bag also, has two large extension side pockets, mirror pocket with mirror, and a small pocket which betweens together for the protection of small and valuables. It is nicely lined, closes with a nickel fastener and has a 13-inch leather handle.

You can have your choice of either of these two stylish Hand-Bags upon the terms of the following special offer:

Given To You! For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you either Bag free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention reward number of Bag wanted.

Billions of Untaxed Securities

American genius early discovered George Washington as an uncommon child because he "could not tell a lie;" but Diogenes is still out with his lamp looking for the rare bird who wants to pay the last penny due the tax collector. A generation ago no boy was looked upon as having completed his education unless he had helped "coon" watermelons. Up until a remarkably recent date most ocean travelers thought themselves lacking in some element of cleverness possessed by their fellow humans until they had "smuggled." Human nature must still have a few flaws because when it comes to taxdodging we have an almost universal malady that is likely never to be cured. President Harding has several times directed attention to the biggest case in point, and it is announced that one of the policies of his Administration will be to insist on another constitutional amendment that will prohibit further tax-exempt securities from being issued. No one seems to know just how this mania for "tax-exempt" securities started, but it is suspected that when enterprising American cities offered new factories "free taxes" that they sowed the wind that led to the ultimate whirlwind represented by the issuance of twenty billion dollars worth of tax-free securities.

Lazy money has grabbed at tax-exempt securities with the result that the public revenue has not only suffered, but the whole industrial situation of the nation has been affected because new capital for development has been curtailed.

Law-making cannot reach the new national evil and it can be cured only by the major operation of a constitutional amendment. But Dr Harding has given orders to prepare the instruments, the anesthetics and the restoratives for a severe case of surgery; and the country will doubtless wish him every success when he starts carving the artful Tax Exempt dodger.

Don'ts in Using Electric Equipment

Don't leave the electric flatiron connected to the circuit and go to use the telephone, visit with the neighbors, or to call at the grocery. It costs $100 for the fire department to make a "run" even for a smoking ironing board.

Don't use paper shades or other inflammable materials or decorations about electric lamps.

Don't use lamp cord wiring in your homes. It is unsightly and unsafe.

Don't permit "the handy man" nor the incompetent workman to do your wiring.

Don't forget that there are 365 days in every year in which to see that your electric wiring is in first-class shape.

Don't forget that good, competent workmanship and first-class materials used in the installation of electric wiring make the best job.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

A Sixth Part of the Total Annual Earnings of the American People Goes to Pay Taxes

THE high and continually rising cost of government reflected in ever increasing tax burdens is a greater and more vicious factor in keeping up the high cost of living than is generally understood. Government expenditures and taxes statistically expressed in millions and billions of dollars are incomprehensible except to financial experts, but when it is explained that a simple analysis of statistics shows that it takes one-sixth of the American people's total annual earnings from labor and capital combined to pay their National, State, county, municipal and other local taxes for the year, the citizen of ordinary intelligence begins to get an idea of the relatively high cost of government in this country. But unless he also does a little careful thinking he will not grasp the broad significance of the explanation so as to derive an approximate conception of the extent to which this oppressive burden affects him personally.

If taxes absorb one-sixth of the total production of the nation it is obvious that the average individual tax burden must amount to one-sixth of the average individual income. At first thought it might seem that this average tax ratio has little if any application to a large part of the community because many of our tax laws are avowedly designed to bear heavily on corporations and wealthy individuals while distinctly favoring or entirely exempting persons of small means or moderate incomes. But such an objection is, in the main, falacious because of the inevitable tendency of all taxes, on whatsoever or whomsoever laid and assessed, to distribute themselves on the entire population. Of course taxes bear more heavily on some than on others, and it is said that everybody is by nature a tax-dodger, but none can by any possibility avoid carrying a considerable portion of the cost of government. Let nobody in blissful but benighted ignorance lay to his selfish soul the flattering unction that he escapes taxation even if his income is within the legal exemption and he owns no taxable property; though not assessed a visible tax he pays an invisible one at every turn, and does not know it.

Like freight rates and rent, taxes are no small element in the cost of production and distribution of raw materials and finished products, and, of course, have to be covered by the selling price of the article. Thus, as a rule, the taxes paid by the producer, the railroad, the wholesaler and the retailer are passed on to the ultimate consumers; thus distributed these are among the many invisible taxes that we pay in our daily transactions.

It is regretable that the precise amounts and various kinds of invisible taxes aggregated and included in the selling price of every article can not be brought distinctly to the purchaser's attention so that by a very simple process of figuring every voter might know the exact total of his or her forced contribution, direct and indirect, to the support of the National, State, county, municipal or other form of local government. I venture the opinion that, if such were the case, a very large number of citizens who now labor under the delusion that, because they pay little or no direct tax they are tax-exempt, and therefore are indifferent to or recklessly favor large, extravagant appropriations and expenditures of public funds on the theory that the increased burden of taxation will fall on the corporations and wealthy individuals, would be shocked into a rude awakening from their complacency and see that it is to their interest to demand rational economy in all the various governmental functions.

Visible taxes levied on the people are unpopular because everybody knows when he pays and just how much. The people raised a tremendous howl against the war taxes on retail sales of ice cream cones, soda fountain drinks, proprietary remedies, toilet articles and certain so-called luxuries in the clothing line, and consequently these visible, direct taxes were the first of the war taxes to be abolished. "Tax the corporations," they say. But where do the corporations get the money to pay their taxes? Railroad, street railroad, telephone, electric light, gas and all other public service companies must necessarily get the money for their taxes from their patrons, most of whom do not stop to think that this invisible item has to be included in the rate bill. It has already been explained that manufacturing and commercial enterprises have to make prices to cover taxes. A large part of the taxes must necessarily be passed on to the ultimate consumer and, of course, everybody tries to pass on as much of his taxes as possible. If all taxes in this country were passed on and distributed to the entire population it would mean that every person expending his entire income would pay out one-sixth of it for invisible taxes.

Although just what portion of the total taxes is passed on and distributed has not been, and probably can not be, definitely determined, it is known to be large, so large as to constitute an important factor in keeping prices up because it keeps costs up. It behooves every voter, regardless of whether he or she is taxed directly, to take a resolute stand against lavish or unnecessary appropriations of public money and to demand of Senators, Congressmen, members of State legislatures and municipal councils strict governmental economy with an aim to lower taxes

President Harding's Success in Reducing the Cost of Government

With our entrance into the World War the Federal Government indulged in an orgy of reckless extravagance and wastefulness which outlasted the war and continued, though at a slower pace, until halted by President Harding through his clean-up and reorganization of the administrative departments and his application of the executive brake to keep appropriations by Congress within the reasonable needs of the country and the available resources of the treasury. During the war appropriations were made regardless of revenue and the enormous deficits were met by the billions of dollars obtained by the sale of Liberty Bonds, Treasury Certificates and War Savings Stamps, and as a result our national debt has grown to twenty-three billions and it takes about a billion a year to pay the interest. It was difficult to wean the departments and Congress from their war-time habit of running the country in debt by spending in excess of the revenues, and, although the departments have been curbed, Congress still manifests a disposition to persist in its bad habit which has been checked in some instances only by President Harding's exercise of the veto power. However, with the able assistance of Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon, the present administration has reduced the "budget" (proposed expenditures of the Federal Government) for the coming year to about three billion dollars, a sum which, large as it is, can be fully met by the present revenues, so that there will be no increase in Federal taxes or national debt unless Congress should upset the program by increasing the proposed appropriations or adding others, which certain Senators and Congressmen apparently purpose to attempt. If they succeed it will result in raising taxes, already burdensome, or piling up additional debt and a bigger interest account.

After the interest item, previously mentioned, the next largest in the "budget" is four hundred and forty millions for the Veterans' Bureau (care of disabled soldiers and their dependents). Some of the other large items are: three hundred forty-five millions for reduction of debt; three hundred twenty-six millions for War Department, including Panama Canal; three hundred sixteen millions for Department of Interior, including the Pension Bureau and certain public works; two hundred ninety-six millions for Navy Department. About two-thirds of the three billions required to pay the government's bills the coming year is expense entailed by the World War. The total expenditures of the Government for 1916, the year before the war, amounted to seven hundred and sixty millions. Compare this with the [illegible] dollars interest bill and the four hundred and [illegible] millions for the Veterans' Bureau.

Tax-Exempt Securities Have Grown to Troublesome Proportions

Indulging in a like riot of prodigality the States, counties, cities and other political subdivisions have added enormously to their debts and interest charges and have largely increased our taxes. The discouraging feature is that efforts to check this vicious tendency have not received much popular support and therefore have been attended with little or no success. Most of the numerous proposed schemes involving increased expenditures of public money receive the approval and support of those who, in their ignorance of the working of the economic law which distributes public burdens through the invisible taxes, calculate that they will share the expected benefits without contributing to defray the cost. Also any official who dares to advocate economy and retrenchment makes himself unpopular while the demagogue who favors extravagance gets the votes. Also in the general tendency of high taxes to discourage enterprise, depress business and retard prosperity is a flare-back that affects all and is given too little attention by many members of the community

The enormous growth of State and municipal debts has resulted in the issue of billions of dollars of tax-exempt State, county, city, town and district bonds. Each State has the power to exempt all such bonds issued for public purposes by its authority, not only from State and local taxation within its borders, but also from taxation by the Federal Government wherever owned or held, so that these securities are nowhere subject to the U. S. income tax. The States make full use of the tax-exempting power because it enables them or their political subdivisions to borrow money at very low rate of interest, in some instances even lower than the interest rate of Liberty Bonds. large holdings of the latter (except those of the first issue) are subject to surtaxes. These tax-proof bonds are eagerly sought (as they are designed to be) by cautious investors who regard perfect security with absolute exemption from taxes as preferable to larger interest yield subject to taxation and attended with an uncertain degree of business risk. From the standpoint of the conservative investor as well as from that of the States there are legitimate arguments in justification of the issuance of reasonable amounts of the favored class of securities. But serious trouble has resulted from the thing having been largely overdone.

The following are some of the evil consequences that are being felt. Throughout the country it is retarding industrial and commercial development by absorbing billions of dollars of idle capital needed for, and which otherwise would be forced to seek investment in, business enterprises; and the vast amount of capital thus absorbed, being tax-exempt, increases the tax burden borne by capital actively employed in business and industry, which acts as a further discouragement to investment in enterprises exposed not only to business risks but also to high and rising taxes.

In order to check this abuse of the tax-exempting power by the States, on recommendation of President Harding and Secretary Mellon a resolution has been introduced in Congress proposing a Constitutional amendment to prohibit the further issuance of tax-exempt securities. Mr. Mellon expresses the opinion that such a restraint is necessary not only for the national welfare but also to protect the States from being loaded with excessive debts by the reckless action of their legislatures.

Order Anything on This Page and Get True Co-Operation

Cut out the in-between profit you now pay the middleman system. Bargains on this page show how you save by this direct merchandise distributing plan. Don't pay more for your Dry Goods—don't pay high prices to clothe your family. Let the Chicago Mail Order Company direct merchandising plan help you smash the wasteful middleman system.

Smash the In-Between Profit System that Has Raised Your Cost of Living!

Twenty-one cents' worth of wheat at the farm costs $1.00 in bread at the kitchen door. $1.00 worth of goods at the factory costs $3.00 at the farm—unless you cut out the middleman. The middleman market system makes a lot of money on food grown by the farmer. The middleman merchandising system steps in and profits on the goods you buy. The producer is squeezed and consumer is profiteered, that the middleman system may live and profit.

A bushel of wheat; a ton of hay; a dozen eggs; a pound of butter; or a day's work, will buy more real merchandise value from the Chicago Mail Order Co. than from any other source in the world!

The Great Chicago Mail Order Company is the connecting link between the factory and you. We take immense outputs of merchandise and distribute them direct and prepaid to customers everywhere. No jobbers, no wholesalers, no traveling men, no retail stores, no profiteers to boost prices. Big quantity buying and no in-between waste means putting prices down to where they belong. This is the common sense co-operative system, through which America's big mail order house, the Chicago Mail Order Company, saves millions of dollars for the American public every year. It is co-operation worked out in a practical way—co-operation that helps you make a real saving.

Brownie's Triumph

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

Mr. Coolidge leaned back in his chair, and laughed heartily.

She did not feel particularly drawn toward either Mrs. Coolidge or her eldest daughter.

She would have fallen had she not been quickly caught and upheld by a strong arm.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Brownie Douglas, waiting at Memorial Hall, Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, is joined by her friend, Aspasia Huntington, a wealthy Baltimore belle, who meets with a slight accident in her dress, attracting the attention of two gentlemen, Adrian Dredmond, an Englishman, and Mr. Gordon who recognizes Brownie, she being an intimate friend of his sisters. Her father, dying before she is born, and her mother at her birth, she is adopted by her great aunt, who gives her her name Mehetabel and brings her up to remember she is a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility. Her nurse calls her Brownie from the first. Adrian Dredmond, stepping upon something, picks up a costly cuff button with a large D, studded with brilliants, and the word "Brownie" in finest letters upon the back. That night Miss Mehetabel Douglas tells Brownie the story of her life, her betrothal to Lord Dunforth, the ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Ruxley, her introduction to Count de Lussan, a man of questionable reputation, her refusal to cancel a dance at Lord Dunforth's command, Helen Capel's treachery in suppressing a note, her serious illness, her coming to America, where her father and mother soon died. She gives Brownie her jewels, including her engagement ring, coral cross and all other gifts from Lord Dunforth, and when she is gone she requests her to take the chain and key from her neck and wear it as long as she lives. That night she dies and upon the reading of the will Mr. Conrad, who has the care of her aunt's property, admits using and losing money entrusted to him, leaving Brownie, after all debts and legacies to the servants are paid, two hundred dollars. Refusing Mr. Conrad's offer to relieve her from anxiety and have her home with him or go with Miss Huntington as her companion, she secures employment in New York, wiring hats. The work hard, she is helped by Mattie Burnham who wins her love and together in the public library Brownie, reading to her in French, attracts the attention of an elderly gentleman who kindly asks if she is a teacher and speaks any other language. Learning she is musical would she be persuaded to teach. If the opportunity presented itself she would and mentions Ware and Coolidge where she is employed. His card, given to her, bears the name of Wm. H. Alcott, M. D.

CHANGE OF OCCUPATION.

THE next day but one, while Brownie was trying her utmost to do her allotted task and get out of the factory an hour earlier, that she might slip down to the reading-room and finish that little French romance in which she had been so deeply interested, Miss Walton came to her and told her, in her grim, curt way, that she was wanted in the office.

Somewhat disturbed by this unexpected summons, she laid aside her work, removed her dainty white apron, then, with heightened color, but a dignified mien, she bent her steps toward the room where she had been received upon her arrival, and which she had not entered since.

Upon opening the door, she was surprised to find sitting, in confidential communication with Mr. Coolidge, Mr. Alcott, the gentleman whose acquaintance she had made in the reading-room two evenings previous.

She bowed slightly to him, and then turned to Mr. Coolidge, who had arisen as she entered, and now greeted her in courteous tones.

"My father-in-law, Mr. Alcott, Miss Douglas," he said, by way of introduction, and Brownie now understood his start of surprise when she gave him her address.

"Be seated, Miss Douglas, if you please," her employer continued, placing a chair for her.

She sat down and folded her little hands in her lap. Both gentlemen noteed her ladylike and self-possessed demeanor, and inwardly commented upon it.

"Miss Douglas, Mr. Alcott has done nothing but rehearse your accomplishments since his meeting with you night before last," said Mr. Coolidge, with an affable smile.

"If what he says is true," the gentleman continued, "and I have no doubt it is, since he is amply qualified to judge, this factory is no place for you."

Was she to be turned away on account of her little knowledge?

"One can not always control one's circumstances, sir," she said quietly.

"True; I understand you, Miss Douglas. But it may be in the power of others to control them for you in a measure. Now, I have a proposal to make to you. If I understood Mr. Alcott correctly, you would like to teach?"

"Indeed, I should like it very much, sir."

"Very well. My family contemplate going abroad in about one week; the steamer sails the tenth, I believe. We have been trying for several weeks to find some person competent to superintend the education of my two younger daughters, and act as a sort of companion and interpreter for them during their travels. Now, will you accept this position and accompany us to Europe?"

"How long do you contemplate remaining abroad?" Brownie asked, after a few moments spent in thought, and greatly surprised at this offer.

"A year, at least; probably longer, if the girls and their mother enjoy it."

"How old are your daughters, Mr. Coolidge?"

"Viola is sixteen, Alma is fourteen. I have another who is twenty, but I believe she considers her education completed, although I think she said something about studying the languages a little more while she is abroad."

"Have the young ladies completed any course as yet?" Brownie asked, wishing to know something of their attainments before deciding.

"No; I regret to say, they have not. Their mother was unwilling they should attend any public institution, so they have had private teachers, and I am afraid they have not improved their advantages as they should have done."

"Indeed, they have not!" exclaimed Mr. Alcott excitedly. "They have behaved shamefully about it, and are a couple of ignoramuses."

Brownie laughed as he said this, then asked: "And do you think, sir, that I am capable of instructing them, if older and wiser teachers have failed?"

"Young lady, when you were reading French to me the other evening, I was not impressed wholly by your pronunciation. No; there was a ring of decision in your tones, there was a look of character and firmness in your face, that told me you would not fail to make a first-class teacher," said the old gentleman with emphasis.

"Your very youthfulness may help you to win where the others have failed. And, as I told you, it is not altogether an instructress that we want, but a refined and genial companion, and an interpreter also, for none of the family are able to converse fluently in foreign languages," said Mr. Coolidge.

Sixteen and fourteen!

They were trying ages—just the time when girls loved fun and frolic better than anything else in the world.

Was she competent to take charge of them and direct their studies?

She longed to accept the position, she longed to go abroad and visit those old countries so fraught with interest, poetry and romance, and where her aunt had lived and suffered so much. But the responsibility! Would it be right for her to assume it? Would she be able to influence these young girls aright?

"Mr. Coolidge," she said, when she had thought of all these things, "I will tell you frankly that I would like this position which you are so kind to offer me, more than I can express, but I am only eighteen years of age myself, and I do not really feel whether I am competent to direct the education of your daughters or not. The other duties, I think, I could fulfill satisfactorily."

"Have you ever completed a regular course of study?" asked Mr. Alcott.

"Yes, sir; a thorough course. I graduated from the high school before I was sixteen, and I have since taken a two years' classical course," replied Brownie.

"You'll do, then," said the old man, with a contented nod of his head.

He was very much interested in the beautiful girl.

"My principal reason for hesitating is that I have never had any experience in teaching, and could only follow the example of my own teachers, so far as I can remember it."

"You are very truthful and frank, at all events," remarked Mr. Coolidge smilingly.

"I should not presume to accept this position, sir, by placing myself in a false position," replied Brownie gravely.

"I think, with my father-in-law, that you will do, and I feel confident that you will prove faithful to your trust. Shall we consider the bargain closed?" asked her employer, giving her a glance of admiration.

"Mr. Coolidge—I—really——" stammered the young girl.

She was astonished that he should desire to close the bargain, without making any inquiries regarding her character or antecedents, and yet she did not know how to broach the subject.

"Ah, I beg your pardon, Miss Douglas," and the man of business looked utterly confused for a moment, "it was an oversight entirely that I did not mention what salary you would receive. Would four hundred a year and expenses meet your acceptance?"

"Make it five, William," interrupted Mr. Alcott, adding: "With those harum-scarum girls it will be none too much; there will be plenty of little knickknacks that she will want to bring away from the old country, and an extra hundred will be none too much."

"Well, call it five hundred and expenses, then," said Mr. Coolidge.

"Excuse me, gentlemen, but I had not thought of the salary which I should receive. I was upon the point of saying that—you know nothing about me personally—whether I am, morally, one whom you would wish to receive into your family. I expected you would require references," Brownie said with dignity.

Mr. Coolidge leaned back in his chair, and laughed heartily, while Mr. Alcott beamed satisfaction at her over his gold-bowed spectacles. He recognized the true coin there.

"Really, Miss Douglas," said the former, "you have shown yourself wiser than I in this matter. That is a question which ought, according to the etiquette of the nineteenth century, to have been settled in the first place."

"The very fact of her speaking of the matter herself is reference enough for me," said Mr. Alcott, sotto voce.

"However," continued her employer, "I suppose Mrs. Coolidge would be better pleased to have that matter satisfactorily settled. What reference can you give us, Miss Douglas?"

"That is where I feared there might arise an objection," replied Brownie, with a sad smile, then added: "I have only one friend in the world to whom I feel at liberty just now to refer you; he is in Philadelphia—Mr. Arthur Conrad."

"What! Arthur Conrad, Esq., the noted lawyer of that city?" exclaimed Mr. Alcott, with great interest.

"Yes, sir. He has known me all my life, and I think I may trust him to speak a good word for me to you."

"That will be sufficient, Miss Douglas," said the old man, with a smile. "Arthur Conrad was a classmate of mine years and years ago; he was a splendid fellow, too. I know all about him, and if he knows all about you, we shall not quarrel over further references."

"I will write to him this afternoon," said Mr. Coolidge, "and we will probably hear in a day or two from him. Then, as this is a mere matter of form, we shall consider that you are engaged to us, and for the salary I named?"

"Yes, sir; and I thank you for your courtesy, and for the confidence which you have shown to me, an utter stranger. I assure you, I will do my utmost to prove myself worthy of the trust you have placed in my hands."

Brownie arose as she spoke, and he saw that tears stood in her grave, beautiful eyes.

Then, bowing to both gentlemen, she returned to her work.

Two, three, four, five days slipped rapidly by, and Brownie heard nothing more from Mr. Coolidge.

On the sixth day, as she was removing her apron and putting her table in order, she saw Miss Walton hastening toward her, a smile of satisfaction gleaming upon her face.

"Miss Douglas," she said, loud enough for several of the other girls to hear, "Mr. Coolidge wishes you to come to the office again; he wishes to settle with you."

Now it was considered quite a disgrace for any one to be called upon to "settle" before the season was over, and Brownie became at once the censure of all eyes in her neighborhood.

Brownie saw that several of the girls were regarding her suspiciously, and listening eagerly to the conversation.

"Yes, Miss Walton," she said, in her clear, sweet tones, "I have been expecting some such message as this for several days. I sail for Europe with Mr. Coolidge and his family on Monday."

CHAPTER X.

BROWNIE AT THE COOLIDGE MANSION.

Mr. Coolidge glanced up with a smile of welcome as Brownie, more beautiful than ever with the excitement of her little encounter with Miss Walton, entered the office.

"Miss Walton said you wished to see me, sir," she said simply.

"Yes, Miss Douglas, as we sail on Monday, I thought best to close your account with the firm tonight."

"You have heard from Mr. Conrad, then, I suppose," she said, taking it for granted, while her face became radiant with hope.

"No, Miss Douglas; I have not. I wrote immediately, but, receiving no reply, after waiting three days, I telegraphed, and his clerk returned word today that he had left town for a week."

Brownie's countenance fell, and she grew very pale.

All her bright hopes crumbled to dust, and nothing remained for her but to plod wearily along day by day.

"I am very sorry," she said, regretfully. "Of course, it is settled that I am not to go with you."

"Why not?" he asked, quickly adding: "You jump at conclusions, do you not? I told you, I believe, that, as we sailed on Monday, I wished to close your account tonight. That does not look much like not going, does it?"

She had forgotten his words, and her face lighted a trifle at this; but she asked:

"But would you be justified, sir, in taking me without a recommendation?"

"I think so, and I think you are over-sensitive upon that point. I never met a governess before without a recommendation who did not try to pass the circumstance over as lightly as possible," returned the gentleman, with an amused smile.

"I only desire that you and Mrs. Coolidge should be entirely satisfied," she said, with proud dignity.

"Miss Douglas," he said, fixing a keen look upon her face, "I told you, when we first talked this matter over, that I considered it a mere form. I have been fully satisfied from the first that you are a lady, and amply qualified for the position I offer you. Now, if you will assure me that there has been nothing in your life, morally speaking, which would debar you from entering my family, I can rest satisfied, and there will be time enough in the future to write to Mr. Conrad."

Anything in her life, morally speaking!

A little smile of scorn curled her red lips, and the color leaped again to her very brow; but she lifted her clear, truthful eyes to his, and he was answered, even before she said, with conscious pride:

"There is nothng, there has been nothing in my life which any one could question."

"I knew it," he answered; "and now I have a request to make, and that is, that you allow me to send my carriage for you this evening. There remains only about a day and a half before we sail, and my family would like to become somewhat acquainted with you beforehand."

Brownie shrank from this ordeal, but she knew it must come sooner or later, and the quicker it was over with the better for all parties.

"Very well, sir," she answered.

"At what time shall I send for you?"

"An hour will give me ample time to make all needful preparations for the change."

"It is five o'clock now. Then at six precisely the carriage shall call for you. We dine at half-past, when you will meet my family. Now, about this account; it is not a very large one, Miss Douglas," he said, smiling, and turning to the books.

After a moment, he continued, with some hesitation:

"Allow me to give you a check on account. You may wish to make some purchases before leaving

True, it would take about fourteen of t for her board and washing, leaving her dollars and fifty cents surplus.

She was to receive a salary of five hund lars a year, and she smiled to think ho the sum looked to her now, and beside were her expenses and the opportunity o of travel in charming Europe.

Brownie arrived at the Coolidge mans

Miss Isabel was evidently very jealo
Brownie's beauty and accomplishments.

She had not been at all pleased that he

This feeling was shared by Mrs. Coolid

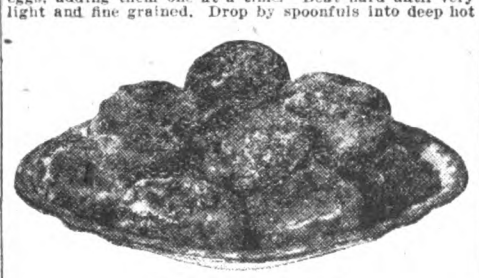
Comfort Sisters' Recipes

MISS Hilma Hanson of Marshalltown, Iowa, wins the COMFORT'S Sisters' Pin this month for having sent the best recipe. By "best" is meant the recipe that is easiest for an inexperienced cook to follow. The recipe for Valentine Cake will be especially welcome to those who entertain, and various ideas on entertaining will be found among the letters from the sisters. —Ed.

BAKED EGG PLANT.—One egg plant, one egg, one teaspoon butter, one-half teaspoon salt, one-quarter teaspoon pepper and three or four crackers. Peel and slice egg plant and boil in salt water until tender, drain, mash well, add egg and cracker crumbs, enough milk or cream to moisten, season with salt and pepper and bake in greased dish half an hour.—MISS HILMA HANSON, Marshalltown, Iowa.

BLACK BEAN SOUP.—Soak one pint of black beans over night, in the morning drain and add two quarts of cold water. Slice one small onion in frying-pan and fry with one tablespoon of butter and one-half cup celery, add to beans and let cook until beans are soft, probably three hours, adding more hot water as necessary. When beans are cooked, rub through a sieve and season with salt, pepper, mustard and a little cayenne. Reheat and thicken with two tablespoons of flour cooked with three tablespoons of butter. Serve hot with slices of hard-boiled eggs and lemon.—MRS. H., New Hampshire.



DEVILED OYSTERS.—Clean, drain and cut in pieces, ne pint of oysters. Make a sauce of one heaping tablespoon butter, one heaping tablespoon flour and one-half cup of milk; cook, add yolk of one egg, a little salt and pepper, and oysters. Put in buttered baking dish and cover with buttered bread-crumbs and bake fifteen minutes.

CREAM PUFFS.—One cup hot water, one-half cup butter, boil together and while boiling stir in one cup sifted flour dry. Take from stove and stir to a smooth paste and when cool stir in three eggs. Stir five minutes, drop on buttered tin and bake in quick oven.

FOR CREAM.—One cup milk, one-half cup sugar, one egg, three teaspoons flour, flavor with lemon. When both this and the puffs are cold, open puffs with knife and fill with cream.

HERMITS.—Three eggs, one cup of butter, one and one-half cups of sugar, one-half teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cloves, one teaspoon allspice, one teaspoon cinnamon, one cup of chopped raisins. Roll thin.

BREAKFAST PUFFS.—Sift together two cups of flour, one level teaspoon of salt, two teaspoons of baking powder, one-half teaspoon of nutmeg, and two thirds cup of sugar. Mix with one cup of milk and two unbeaten eggs, adding them one at a time. Beat hard until very light and fine grained. Drop by spoonfuls into deep hot fat and fry to a golden brown. Small puffs will cook better than larger ones. Have a plate of sugar at hand in which to roll the puffs when taken from fat. If the puffs do not rise quickly or are not light, it is because the dough is not quite stiff enough, and a little more flour should be added.

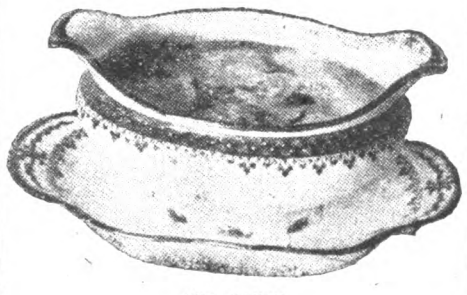
DARK PUDDING.—Three cups of flour, one cup molasses, one and one-half cup raisins (chopped), two-thirds of a cup of suet, one cup milk, one teaspoon of soda and a little salt, one teaspoon of cloves, one of cassia, one of allspice; steam from four to five hours.

SAUCE.—Two cups of sugar, one of butter, rub to a cream, add three or four tablespoons of boiling water just before sending to the table; if wanted extra nice, add the white of an egg; flavor to taste.

SUET PUDDING.—One cup suet, chopped fine; one cup chopped raisins, one cup molasses, one cup boiling water, large teaspoon soda, flour to make stiff. Beat in one egg and teaspoon cassia. Serve with sauce to suit taste. Steam three hours.

RAISED DOUGHNUTS.—One cup of sugar, a piece of butter the size of a nutmeg, one egg, one cup sweet milk, one-half teaspoon of soda. Mix with flour stiff enough to knead. Raise over night. Handle carefully in the morning without kneading. Twist and fry.

MOLASSES DOUGHNUTS.—One cup molasses, one cup new milk, two teaspoons cream tartar, one teaspoon soda, five teaspoons melted butter, one egg, cinnamon and nutmeg; flour enough to roll.



SOUR MILK DOUGHNUTS.—One cup sugar, two eggs, one-half cup sour milk, piece butter size of a nutmeg, one teaspoon soda, a little salt; knead soft and spice to taste.

APPLE PUFF.—One egg, one tablespoon butter, one cup sweet milk, and one teaspoon baking powder. Mix together and add enough flour (sift baking powder with flour) so that the batter will drop easily from spoon. Peel and slice cooking apples and put into earthen baking dish and cover with the batter. Bake in hot oven and serve with cream sauce or whipped cream.—MRS. METTIE ALGOOD, Stony Fork, N. C.

CREAM CANDY.—Dissolve two cups of brown sugar in one-half cup of water and boil until it spins a thread, add three tablespoons of melted butter, one-quarter teaspoon salt and let boil until it forms a soft ball when dropped in water. Remove from fire and add one teaspoon orange extract, stir until it begins to grain, pour into greased tin and when partly cooled cut into squares. —GRACIE, Idaho.

COFFEE JELLY WITH BANANA.—Soak two even tablespoons of fine gelatin in half a cup of cold water twenty minutes. Bring to a boil one and a half cup of strong coffee, one-half cup of sugar, and a small pinch of salt. Add to softened gelatin and pour into mould. To serve, turn onto plate, surround with sliced banana, and on top arrange a circle of the banana and top with whipped cream.

EGG SAUCE.—Put one-fourth cup of butter into a saucepan where it will quickly melt but not brown, and when it bubbles add two rounding tablespoons of dry flour and mix until smooth. Gradually add two cups of hot water, stirring rapidly. Cook two minutes, then add one-fourth cup of butter and beat until perfectly smooth with the addition of one-third teaspoon of salt, unless the butter is salt, and a little pepper. Add two hard-boiled eggs, cut into thin slices and serve.

A delicious sauce to serve with boiled fowl is made by adding the chicken livers boiled and mashed fine and the juice of one lemon to the above sauce in place of the eggs.

VALENTINE CAKE.—One cup of sugar creamed with one-third of a cup of butter until smooth and light yellow. Beat, until very light, three eggs, and then beat these into the butter and sugar. Stir in one-half cup of milk and then beat in two cups of flour to which one even teaspoon of baking powder has been added. Beat hard until light and smooth. Bake in a round pan in a moderate oven. When cold, spread thickly.

FROSTING.—Stir together the whites of two eggs and two teaspoons of lemon juice, and very gradually stir in two scant cups of powdered sugar. Beat with the egg beater five minutes, and spread on cake. Around the sides press candy hearts into the soft frosting, and on the top of cake spread finely chopped walnut meats.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton, born rich, dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Upon her death there is left forty pounds a year. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; she has no faith in him, and finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis's. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman. He does not explain but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. She remodels a velvet dress sewn with amethysts for Mrs. Gibbs, who tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, hearing footsteps, and a whistle which reminds her of Lesard, listens, and with shoes in hand steals down the stair-case and spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." With his words, "Promise to trust me whatever happens," ringing in her ears, she gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The masked ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband. With the guests at supper a robbery is committed. Mrs. Fareham's jewels, her grace's too, are missing and only Gillian's jewel case left. Detectives arrive and Sir Charles Vivian's statements, as to his movements before the dinner, relieve him and Gill of suspicion. Requesting to see her maid and how she forgot the jewels, Gillian admits she was sick in bed and knew nothing about her not wearing them. The robbery breaks up the party, and Jacky, packing up, asks Gill what they are to do. It's done. If Gill tells all she knows she may find out Lesard is married before, and Jacky reads his last letter to Gill, and while loathing the man whom she believes has wronged both, she knows they are not strong and brave enough. Marchmont insists that Gillian shall appear at dinner and Jacky requests her not to ring, she is to sit with Mrs. Gibbs, and late in the evening she slips down-stairs, opens a door, standing behind it. She recognizes the voices of Lesard and Brookes and the latter calls "All clear," and she sees Marchmont, Brookes and Lesard who is bringing the jewels, which he carries in his belt, the stones removed by Marchmont and Lesard laying the canvas belt in the place uncovered. Struggling she gains the passage back, her hands bleeding. Gill meets her, hurrying her to safety and Jacky hears Brookes query why Lesard goes out the other way and what will prevent his coming back and taking it. Gillian goes to walk with Sir Charles Vivian and is joined by Jacky. She admits Jacky is her sister. Jacky discovers a flash of light. Someone is within. She has found the other way.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE END OF THE PASSAGE.

ABSOLUTELY quiet, Jacky stood against the cold stone of the wall and waited. From the terrace above thick ivy trails came down to meet the hedge-like stems of the creepers that were rooted in the damp grass at her feet, growing at a distance of a foot or more from the wall; by tight squeezing she could get behind them.

In the green gloom of their ever-green leaves she looked toward the pool through the tiny passage of which the embankment made one side, the ivy trails and stems the other. There was the sickening swirl of the waters about three yards from her, close to the foot of the wall which apparently sprang out of it. But did it?

Slowly she edged herself forward inch by inch. Utterly careless of slugs and snails, she took off her hat and laid it on the ground, so that it should not catch in the ivy and rustle the leaves. About a yard from the pool she stopped, mindful of that someone who was in the tunnel. To get out would he have to dive into that awful water that was sucking underground with the speed of a mill race?

Common sense told her even Lesard would not dare that! She was leaning forward eagerly when she was conscious of a sound that was not the swirl of the water. A human sound, that made her pull a thick hanging branch of ivy toward her till it made an impervious screen between her and the pool. Step by-step she backed away.

Whoever was in that place was coming out!

What she had heard was the spring and landing of a heavy man or something that creaked and gave under his weight.

If it were Lesard—if he came out and found her—could she get the better of him? Or would that dark water make a quick ending of Jacky Hamilton by an ordinary accident that would need no explanation? In the chill fear of death that came over her, she bit into her arm to keep herself from screaming for help to Sir Charles and Gillian. This new Lesard would stick at nothing to get her out of the way.

"I'll scream a thousand times before he does it!" her courage came back to her savagely. "I won't be murdered with help within fifty yards of me!"

But there was no other sound, no stirring of the black water. She began to think she had been dreaming when a curious brushing noise as if someone were crawling on the ground close by her, made her prick up her ears. Whatever it was, it was the other side of the ivy bush she had pulled in to the wall. Once more she crept up to it, and nearly recoiled and set all the creepers shaking.

On the ground at the foot of the wall, quite close to her where the ivy had apparently hidden impervious stone, was the back of a man's head and shoulders!

It was Lesard! With a sick heart, a dizzy head, she looked down on that short cut hair that had been so dear to her, those shoulders that she had loved for their iron muscles.

Once she would have flown to him, clung to him, told him all her troubles, secure in his love of her. Now she only shrank from his neighborhood in loathing and in deadly fear.

Close against the wall, breathless, fascinated, she watched him worm his way through what she knew now was an opening where no opening seemed possible. He rose, and stood panting as if he had had hard work, even for him. If he had turned his head he must have seen her, but he had eyes only for the pool. What was he going to do? She clung to the ivy from very weakness as he began to edge toward the water, waiting for the splash which should tell the undermined earth had given under him. Afterwards she knew that it was solid rock where he stood, yet now the very temptation of hell gripped her.

One step forward, one quick shout, and there would be no more Lesard! Gillian would be free forever, and Jacky—with a dreadful revulsion Jacky Hamilton knew that to look on Lesard's dead face would be never to forget it—to live on in a vain agony of longing to have him live again. She hated him, but not like that. Dear saints, not like that! "Vengeance is mine. I will repay." The words seemed to rise from the throbbing waters to her ears; and the awe of them made a cold sweat creep out on her face.

The hand she had so nearly thrust forth to kill dropped nerveless at her side.

At the faint sound Lesard looked round him sharply, like a hunted animal. But he was dazzled by the daylight after the darkness of the tunnel and saw nothing. He was only waiting for his eyes to clear in the light, and as the girl watched him he seemed to gather himself together till the strong muscles were like whipcord in his body. And then with a quick sideways jerk he leaped clear out into the air like a panther does.

Out over the pool—surely he could never clear it! Jacky stared wildly through the screen of branches, and could not see. Yet he must have cleared it, for there was no splash.

Something jerked violently, rustled, jerked again in the air over her head. Careless almost if he saw her or not, she looked out, for she must see. And even in her hatred of him she was proud of what he had done. None but a brave man would have tried it, no one who had not strength of steel could have accomplished it.

Lesard had made a standing leap from his narrow foothold to where, at a distance that seemed impossible to clear, a stout branch hung downward from the top of the high wall where it grew. The man had sprung straight for it, caught it, hung there now; a slip, a falling short, would have meant that black pool there was no getting out of, and to go round the water was impossible on the rotten ground. Besides, there would be the park to cross, people to meet, and this was secure.

For as she gazed he went hand over hand up the branch, swinging perilously; caught his foot over it, and—as she drew back just in time—stood on the embankment, smiling in breathless triumph. Truly it was a feat, even for him. And smiling still he vanished, swallowed up in the thick growing trees above. When the last sound of his steps had died away Jacky crept out and looked around her. There was no mark or footprint anywhere to tell a tale; she saw why he had not climbed up by the ivy where she had been. There would have been broken stems, hanging trails to wither and show where he had passed, and now there was nothing.

Yet his cleverness was all wasted—made useless by the luck of a slip of a girl! He had shown her what for herself she never would have discovered, the secret way into Hamilton Place. Down on her knees, Jacky parted the ivy and saw the narrow, dark hole he had come out of, heard inside it the sullen gurgle of water drawn very quickly underground; saw, too, that the spot she knelt on was the only solid place on the margin of the pool. The rest was undermined, crumbling. Where she had stood at first when she surprised Vivian was gone; black water was there instead. Truly the butler had done wisely to shirk "the other way!" It would need a stronger head than his to dare it.

But it was now or never for the jewels, unless Lesard had gone off with them already.

Had he been there ever since last night?

She thrust her head into the hole and drew it back appalled at the utter darkness before her. It had been a very different matter for Lesard, coming out, with daylight in front of him.

She pulled matches and a candle end out of her pocket and lit a pale, wavering flame. Then she tried the hole again, holding the light at arm's length before her.

It was just a square passage like a manhole in a sewer. Dark and noisome, it was so narrow even for her that she was nervous lest she should stick fast in it. Inch by inch she dragged herself in, and suddenly saw she was through it. She stood up with infinite caution, and found she was on that shelf of old boards that had creaked as Lesard landed on it.

For a moment she could see round her nothing but black water, above her a vaulted roof. Then as her eyes grew used to the gloom she knew where she was. There was the round cave she had seen dimly lighted the night before—only now she was at the other side of it—the very heap of stones still undisturbed under which Marchmont had bidden the jewels. But she was as far off from them as she had been outside. Between her and the solid rock floor of the cave was water where the stream curved before it sank bodily into the ground. The roaring of it made her dizzy, the mere look of it appalled her.

Between her and the cave it was four feet wide, at her right hand it stretched broad and boiling to where the rocky roof met in the darkness; at her left—candle in hand—she stared.

There had been no need to jump to the plank where she stood! Lesard had done it for mere wantonness. A ledge of rock, narrow, interrupted, wide enough only for one foot to follow the other, showed here and there above the stream. A steady head could cross it, but could she? As she leaned and looked a faint sound made her start. The candle fell from her hand into the oily concave of the water as it sank into the ground. She was alone in the dark, and it unnerved her to panic.

Frantic with horror of the place she swung round on her heel, and lying down saw the blessed daylight before her through the way she had come. Quivering from head to foot, the girl who had begun so well, crawled out like a rat through a drain, with only one thought—the dear daylight, the sweet air!

Outside she drew breath after breath like one stifled, standing pale and damp where Lesard had stood. And to her ears came the sound that had made her drop the candle.

Gillian, very near her, was calling at the top of her lungs:

"James! James!"

Jacky flew through the ivy to the path where she stood.

"What is it? What's the matter?" she cried, looking like a dirty ghost of herself, and slimy and damp.

"Marchmont's back. Quick, come out of this!" She looked appalled at Jacky, hatless and dirty.

"Where have you been? Did you find anything?"

"Yes!" Jacky made a dive for her discarded hat, threw Gillian's waterproof over her dirty gown. "Now!" she cried, "where's Sir Charles?" Gillian blushed.

"Waiting round the corner. Jacky, he's very good and kind!"

"I know that," but she spoke fiercely, with a lump in her throat.

Lesard was neither; yet after him she could not see how Gillian had eyes for any other man!

CHAPTER XIV.

HOW THE TRAGEDY BEGAN.

Mr. Marchmont had indeed returned, after an absence of barely two hours, but it was no thought of his ward and Sir Charles that had brought him back. Things far more important had driven them completely out of his head.

Sir Simon Wellford had been at home. He had, as Marchmont surmised, been consulting with the London detective during the morning, had also been adjured to hold his tongue, a direction which he, of course, did not follow as regards his neighbors of Hamilton Place, who had also lost jewels in the robbery.

There was no sign of the detective. Mr. Marchmont would have been better pleased to have found him there. When he at last extracted the cause of his absence from the too talkative Sir Simon, he had an unpleasant shock. Only for an instant; a glow of exultation followed it and made him put his hand to his mouth to cover a smile of triumph.

Let them wonder if those two strange men who had taken Ashcroft Farm—and were certainly not farmers—had had any hand in the robbery! Let them watch—and suspect! They were a day after the fair. No one would either suspect the secret hiding place in his own house, or be able to watch it if they did. Truly the jewels had left Ashcroft Farm just in time.

One thought did dash his smug satisfaction.

Suppose the detective saw Lesard leave the farm after dark and calmly repair to the side door of Hamilton Place—what then?

Mr. Marchmont provided against the dangerous contingency on the spot.

"That seems rather hopeless, I fear, Sir Simon," he said, with a deprecating smile. "Of course I know nothing about the man at Ashcroft except that he took the farm from me, but it would be curious if he turned out a burglar. I should feel rather an idiot," with his slight laugh.

"Why?" Sir Simon started.

"Only that the man has asked me to take him on as land steward, and I was seriously considering the matter. In fact, I told him to come over and get his answer some evening this week. He showed me some letters as to his fitness—to tell the truth, I thought him a broken-down gentleman."

Sir Simon's hopes were dashed.

"Oh!" he exclaimed blankly. "Well, you may be right! But, my dear Mr. Marchmont, I should consider well before I engaged him."

"I shall, of course. But frankly I am afraid our London friend has embarked on a wild-goose chase in that direction."

"Richardson is a clever man!"

Mr. Marchmont did not doubt it. The detective was far too clever for his taste. But he merely insinuated to Sir Simon that the tenant at Ashcroft had got himself disliked by ... up a right of way and made enemies of ... bors. After which he drove home, ... in his mind, pondering whether he ... over and warn Lesard. Small wonder ... to send for Gillian's maid and ask ... the afternoon, or that he barely noticed ... Some Beef Recipes

ROAST.—Five pounds of beef cut from the , middle or face of rump, or the "vein." Put e beef fat in a hot frying-pan and sear the surface of the roast. In a deep dish or that covers closely put half a cup of water the meat, and bake in a very slow oven sevhours, adding a very little water from time e if necessary. At no time should the waoil. One hour before taking meat from oven y be surrounded with pared potatoes. This is delicious cold.

SIRLOIN ROAST.—The flank may be cut off and used in stews, or it may be drawn underneath and held in place by skewer or string. Have the oven very hot. Rub with salt, then dredge both meat and pan with flour. Put pieces of fat meat, or a few spoonfuls of beef fat into the bottom of pan which should be only a little larger than the roast, so that the fat will be ample for basting without the addition of water. The meat should sear quickly to prevent the escape of juices. Lay on rack with cut surface upward, turning until entirely seared. Reduce heat a little, baste and dredge several times. During the last half hour the fat side of roast is turned on top so that it will cook crisp and brown. A six-pound roast should cook an hour and a quarter unless it is liked very rare.

SCOTCH STEAK.—Pound flour into both sides of any of the cheaper cuts of steak, using as much as it will take up. Fry in beef drippings, turning as it browns. Add boiling water to cover and set closely covered where it will just simmer for two hours. When done the gravy is already thickened and the flavor is delicious. Add a sprinkling of salt half an hour before serving. Use only fat enough to sear with.

HUNGARIAN GOULASH.—Cut two pounds of good steak into two-inch pieces and roll in flour. Slowly fry a thin slice of salt pork until light brown, add the beef and cook slowly for half an hour, stirring occasionally. Cover with boiling water and simmer two hours. Season with salt and pepper. Make a sauce as follows: Two cups of stewed tomato, one stalk of celery cut fine, one sliced onion, two bay leaves, six whole cloves, six peppercorns, and one blade of mace put into a saucepan, covered with water and cooked until soft. Mash and press through a sieve. Drain the stock from the cooked meat into the prepared vegetables and thicken with equal parts of flour and butter rubbed together. Season with salt and paprika. Serve the meat on a platter with the sauce poured over. Cubes of boiled potatoes, carrots and green peppers cooked together may be sprinkled over this dish when served in true Hungarian style.

AITCHBONE STEW.—Use about four pounds of meat and bone which should be sawed in several pieces. Cut the meat from bone and into small pieces, then sprinkle with salt, a very little pepper and roll in flour. Try out some of the fat and sear the meat, stirring constantly. Put meat into stew kettle, and in the same fat slightly fry two sliced onions, two sliced carrots and one small turnip and add to meat. Add the bone and cover with boiling water and simmer two or three hours, or until the meat is tender. One hour before the stew is done lay several potatoes cut into fourths on top of the stew. They are prepared and soaked in cold water one hour previously. Add salt. The dumplings are added twelve minutes before taking the stew from fire and the cover must not be lifted after putting them in. To make dumplings, sift two cups of flour with three teaspoons of baking powder and one-half teaspoon of salt. Rub in a little butter and mix soft with sweet milk. Drop by spoonfuls into the stew.

MOCK DUCK.—Cut a half-inch slice from the top of the round and quickly sear both sides in beef fat. Spread with a dressing made from buttered soft bread-crumbs and seasoned with sage, onion juice, salt and pepper. A little chopped celery may also be added. Roll and tie and dredge generously with flour. Place in a covered pan in a moderate oven and bake three hours. Add a little water after the first hour and baste and dredge frequently.

Soup Recipes

BROWN SOUP STOCK.—The simplest process preserves all the nutriment and flavor but does not provide a clear stock which can only be prepared by sacrificing certain elements of the meat. Use about two-thirds lean meat and one-third marrow-bone and fat. Cut off the lean and put through meat chopper. Clean the marrow from bone and in it fry about one-third of the lean meat, stirring continually until thoroughly seared and colored. Put one quart of cold water into the frying-pan and simmer until all the marrow has been taken up by cooking. Put raw meat, bone, fat and contents of frying-pan into the soup kettle and cover with cold water. Let stand one hour, stirring occasionally to draw out the meat juices. Very gradually bring to a boil and simmer six hours. A safe rule for amount of water is to use one pint to a pound of soup material. The scum which rises should not be removed if all the meat extracts are desired as it contains the coagulated albuminous juices. If a flavored soup stock is desired, about one and a half hour before the stock is done, add salt, a mixture of chopped vegetables and prepared sweet herbs. Strain through a fine wire sieve.

WHOLE WHEAT MUFFINS.

MOCK TURTLE SOUP.—Scrape clean and wash one calf's head and soak one hour covered with cold water. Cut the head into several pieces and put into the soup kettle with three quarts of cold water and one tablespoon of salt. Bring slowly to a boil and simmer until the meat slips from the bones. Strain. Press the face meat into a dish to cool and later cut it into small cubes. Return head-stock to kettle with one large carrot, one small turnip, two small onions, and one-half cup of celery all sliced or cut fine, five whole peppers, six cloves, six allspice, one-eighth teaspoon of cinnamon and one cup of cooked tomato and cook until the stock is reduced to three pints. Strain and cool. Lightly brown two tablespoons of butter and add two tablespoons of dry flour and gradually add two cups of hot brown soup stock. Add head-stock, juice of half a lemon, cubes of meat from head and more salt if necessary, cook a few minutes and just before serving add three hard-boiled eggs cut in thin slices and half a sliced lemon.

FRENCH ONION SOUP.—Two and one-half cups of thinly-sliced onion slowly fried in one-third cup of butter until they are slightly browned and about half done. Add one pint of boiling water, cover closely and finish cooking where they will scarcely simmer. Slow cooking of the onion is the secret of this soup. Add one quart of hot milk or soup stock, cook two minutes while stirring and season. Toast thinly-sliced biscuits in the oven and spread with rich cheese, cream cheese preferable. In each soup plate lay pieces of the prepared toast and then pour over the soup.

CREAM OF TOMATO SOUP.—Melt four tablespoons of butter and smooth in four tablespoons of dry flour with one-half teaspoon of salt and a little white pepper. When it bubbles, slowly add three cups of hot milk and simmer ten minutes. In another saucepan put two cups of stewed tomato, one tablespoon of thinly-sliced onion, one-fourth of a bay leaf, two tablespoons of sugar and cook fifteen minutes, then rub through a sieve. Return to stove and when the boiling point is reached add one-fourth teaspoon of soda and at once combine with the hot milk sauce. Beat hard and serve with toasted cubes of bread or crackers. In place of bay leaf and pepper, one scant half teaspoon of curry powder may be used.

General Recipes

WHOLE-WHEAT MUFFINS.—One and one-half cup of whole wheat or graham, one-half cup of white flour, four teaspoons of baking powder, three-fourths teaspoon of salt, two tablespoons of sugar sifted together. Beat one egg, add one cup of milk and beat into drys. A little more milk may be necessary. Beat in three tablespoons of melted butter and bake in gem tins in a moderately hot oven.

DECORATED CAKE.—Cream one-half cup of butter and gradually add one cup of sugar. Sift together one cup of flour, one-half cup of cornstarch and two teaspoons of baking soda. Add one-half teaspoon of vanilla to one-half cup of milk. Add milk and flour mixture alternately to the butter mixture, beat until smooth and lastly fold in two egg whites beaten stiff and dry. Bake in a deep round tin. When cold cover with a chocolate frosting made by melting two squares of chocolate and gradually stirring in one-fourth cup of hot cream, one-half teaspoon of butter, a pinch of salt, and one-fourth teaspoon of vanilla. Add one beaten egg yolk and powdered sugar until it will spread without running. Dust with shredded cocoanut around the sides. Spread a wide band of white frosting around the top made from the unbeaten white of an egg, three teaspoons of lemon juice and powdered sugar. Build a nest of the cocoanut and fill with candies which are also placed around the edge of cake.

COFFEE AND FRUIT PUDDING.—Soak two tablespoons of granulated gelatin in one-half cup of cold water ten minutes and dissolve with three cups of strong hot coffee. Add one-half cup of sugar and one-half teaspoon of vanilla. Set in a cool place, and when partly jellied stir in one cup of clean chopped dates. Turn into a wet mould and set away to stiffen. Serve with sweetened whipped cream. Sour cream well sweetened and flavored with nutmeg is also good with this pudding.

COFFEE SOUFFLE.—Soak one tablespoon of granulated gelatin in one-eighth cup of cold water. Bring one and one-half cup of strong coffee, one-fourth cup of sugar and one-half cup of rich milk to a scald in a double boiler and stir in the gelatin. Beat the yolks of two eggs with one-fourth cup of sugar and one-fourth teaspoon of salt and pour over them the hot coffee mixture, stirring continually. Return to boiler, stir and cook until the mixture thickens. Remove from fire, beat in the two egg whites beaten to a stiff froth and one teaspoon of vanilla. Turn into serving dish to stiffen. Just before serving top with sweetened whipped cream.

BAKED INDIAN PUDDING.—Bring three and one-half cups of rich milk to a scald and gradually add one-third cup of corn meal mixed with one-half cup of cold milk. Cook twenty minutes then add one-half cup of molasses, one teaspoon of salt and one-half teaspoon of mixed ginger, cinnamon and nutmeg. Pour into a greased baking dish and bake three hours in a very slow oven. Serve with a sauce made as follows: White of one egg, one-half cup of thick cream, one-third cup of milk, one cup of powdered sugar and one-half teaspoon of vanilla, all beaten together with the egg-beater until thick and creamy.

DRIED APPLE SAUCE.—Cover one and one-half cup of dried apple with cold water and soak ten minutes, then rub between the hands and rinse through several waters. Cover with fresh cold water and soak over night. Cook until tender in the same water, adding more water if necessary. Unless the apple has cooked up fine, put it through a wire sieve. Add one cup of sugar, and if the apples lack flavor add a little lemon juice and about one-third teaspoon of cinnamon. Do not cook after adding sugar and seasoning.

DRIED APPLE PIE.—Prepare apples as above, cooking in as little water as possible until half or two-thirds done. Line deep pie plate with a good crust and lay in the apple. Dot with butter and cover with one cup of sugar mixed with a little cinnamon and nutmeg. Many like less sugar and two tablespoons of good molasses. Bake a full hour in a moderate oven.

SCALLOPED FRUIT.—Wash one cup of dried apricots, cover with cold water and let stand until the skins will rub off. Just cover with cold water and let stand over night. Cut two apples into very thin slices after peeling and coring. Break soft bread into fine crumbs, using two cupfuls. Make layer of apricot, apple and bread-crumbs in a baking dish, dot with butter and sprinkle with a little cinnamon, nutmeg and sugar. Repeat until all are used. Use about one cup of sugar. Bake in a fairly hot oven until the apple is soft. Just before taking from the oven top the scallop with a few marshmallows sprinkled with dry cake-crumbs and remove dish from oven as soon as they have melted. Serve hot or cold.

STUFFED DATES.—Remove skins, cut a long slit in one side of each date and remove stones. Allow half a teaspoon of peanut butter to each date and stir in a little sugar and lemon juice. Fill dates and roll in powdered sugar.

DATE SOUFFLE.—Remove skins, stone, and cut half a pound of dates into small pieces. Add one-half cup of boiling water and cook until soft, stirring frequently to prevent sticking. Put through a sieve. The mixture should not be watery. Beat the whites of five eggs until very dry and stiff and gradually beat in one-fourth cup of powdered sugar, one tablespoon of lemon juice and a pinch of salt. Fold the two mixtures together without beating and pour into a buttered baking dish. Bake in a moderate oven until well puffed which will take nearly a half-hour.

CREAM SPONGE CAKE.—Yolks of four eggs, one cup of sugar, three tablespoons cold water, one and one-half tablespoon corn-starch, nearly one cup of flour, one and one-half teaspoons baking powder, one-quarter teaspoon salt, whites of four eggs. Beat yolks of eggs until thick and lemon-colored, add sugar gradually and beat two minutes, then add water. Put corn-starch in cup and then fill with flour. Mix and sift corn-starch with baking powder and salt and add to first mixture. When thoroughly mixed add whites of eggs beaten until stiff and one teaspoon lemon extract. Bake thirty minutes in a moderate oven.

HERMITS.—One-half cup of butter, two-thirds cup of sugar, one egg, two tablespoons milk, one and three-quarters cup of flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one-third cup of raisins, stoned and chopped in fine pieces, one-half teaspoon cinnamon, one-quarter teaspoon clove, mace and nutmeg. Cream butter, add sugar gradually, then raisins, egg well beaten and milk. Roll thin.

SPICE COOKIES.—One-half cup molasses, one-half cup of sugar, one and one-half tablespoons butter, one and one-half tablespoons lard, one tablespoon milk, two cups flour, one-half teaspoon soda, one-half teaspoon salt, one-half teaspoon clove, one-half teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon nutmeg. Heat molasses to a boiling point. Add sugar, shortening and milk. Let stand in a cold place to thoroughly chill.

Cubby Bear and the Mumps

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"DEAR, dear! No sooner is one trouble ended than another comes in its place." So fretted Bunny Rabbit. "My beautiful house was burned in the forest fire started by the farmhouse children, when they came here to roast corn and potatoes——"

"Yes, but your friends all helped you to build another," answered Dr. Squilly Porcupine, his mouth stretching in a big yawn. For Bunny had come to Squilly's house in the gray light of an early morning, and made his doleful plaint. "Did you come and wake me just to complain that you are not happy? Your new house is better than your old one was, and it is set in a pleasanter place. We all helped make chairs and tables, and cribs for your Baby Bunnies. What more do you want?"

"No one thought to make a bed for me," complained Bunny, "and I had to do it myself!"

"And why not, I should like to know?" asked Squilly. "Would I have had a bed to sleep on if I had not made one for myself?"

Bunny Rabbit stood wringing his paws helplessly.

"Oh, how you bother me!" he cried unreasonably. "Why do you stand and scold at me instead of coming home with me and seeing if you can help my poor, sick Bunny Babies?"

Dr. Squilly Porcupine reached for his mdicine case, slammed his door behind him, and started in the direction of Bunny's new house, all in less time than it takes to tell about it.

"Why," demanded Squilly rather crossly, "why did you not tell me at first, that your Baby Bunnies were sick, instead of standing there complaining?"

"I did!" answered Bunny, mopping away his tears.

"You did not!" declared Dr. Squilly. "But perhaps you meant to, and then thought you had. What ails them?"

"I do not know. They won't eat, though I cooked their oat porridge just the best I knew how. I even put a bit of pepper in it, to please them, and then they didn't like it!"

"Pepper, indeed!" exclaimed Squilly in disgust. "No wonder they wouldn't eat!"

"Their little eyes are red, and drip tears!" went on Bunny. "And when I tried to wash them, they all squealed and said I hurt them. And then I noticed that their cheeks were fat—oh, very fat indeed—they had grown fat just over night."

"They were swollen, silly!" said Squilly Porcupine. "It is my opinion that your Baby Bunnies have the mumps."

At that, Bunny Rabbit tumbled over, all in a quivering heap.

"Mumps, mumps!" he quavered. "What a frightening, scareful sound the word has!"

"Get up, and come with me!" ordered Squilly. "Have you no common sense at all? Mumps are not dangerous if you take good care of them."

They soon reached Bunny's house, and found the sick Baby Bunnies all in their little cribs.

Dr. Squilly looked them over, felt their pulse, looked at their tongues, and gently patted the little cheeks, which had grown wondrously fat over night.

"Mumps," he said. "Double mumps—every single one of them has mumps on both sides. Keep a good fire," he told Bunny, "and see that their little toes are warm. I have never doctored the mumps, but I will leave you some very good checkerberry pills for them."

Just then came a loud pounding at the door, and Betty Badger burst in, quite out of breath.

"Come with me, Dr. Squilly Porcupine," she cried. "Do not lose a minute. My five children are sick! Their eyes drip tears, they cannot eat, and their cheeks have swollen big and fat over night."

"What, what?" cried Dr. Squilly. "More mumps?"

They hurried off together, and had not gone far before they met Mr. Wise Owl. Wise Owl was staggering toward them, trying to shield his face from the cold autumn wind, with his wing.

His eyes, when he looked at them, were red, and every feather on his face was standing on end.

"How funny you look!" said Betty Badger.

"Funny—funny, is it?" cried Wise Owl, hopping up and down in a fury. "Let me tell you it is not so funny for me! I cannot eat—to talk gives me pain. See how my face is swollen! I was hunting for you, Dr. Squilly Porcupine, to tell me what is the matter?"

"Mumps!" said Dr. Squilly solemnly.

"I——with the mumps!" cried Wise Owl. "I will not have them! Will not, I tell you! Mumps are for babies!"

"What are mumps, anyway?" asked Betty Badger.

"What the Bunny Babies, and your own children, and Wise Owl are sick with," answered Squilly.

"Mumps," answered Wise Owl (you see he was very wise indeed), "are—or is—an un-sup-pu-ra-tive in-flam-ma-tion of the sal-i-va-ry glands."

"Oh, oh, how terrible!" burst from Betty Badger's pale lips. "My poor children! I am sure they will never get well."

"Oh, I am happy, happy!
A happy little bear,
For little Kiddie Goat has said
He'll come—tra-la-la-lare!"

So sang Cubby Bear at the top of his voice that same day, the while he swept the kitchen with the broom Mamma Bruin had made of hemlock boughs tied to a stick.

"What's that you're singing, Cubby?" asked Grandma Bear.

NOW HERE, NOW THERE, DR. SQUILLY PORCUPINE AND HIS FAITHFUL HELPER, CUBBY BEAR, WERE CALLED.

"Why, little Kiddie Goat has promised me a visit before winter comes, when he shut up in the barn. He may come any He is a dear little goat, and we shall beautiful time. Perhaps he may stay week with me!"

Cubby began sweeping big pile of the door, instead of taking it up should have done.

"Ah—hoo!" spluttered Wollie Woodp was just about to come in. "You have into my eyes—and down my throat! a polite way to greet a caller!" sneezed and rubbed his eyes.

"Oh, please excuse me!" said Cubby brush you—I am sorry! Come in!"

"I cannot stop to come in," answered "Dr. Squilly Porcupine sent me here if you would help him. Had you heard sickness in our Pleasant Forest, Cubby

"No. Who is sick—tell me!"

"All the Bunny Babies, and Betty children, and Wise Owl, and no one will be the next. Squilly Porcupine doctor, you know, and he is so busy he a helper."

"What is the trouble?" asked Cubby

"Mumps," answered Wollie. "Squilly to help with the sick ones, but did catch mumps? I told him I was sure want to help."

"But what are mumps?" was Cubby question.

"Mumps," answered Wollie, "so Wise are—or is—an un-un-sup-a-tive in-flam the sallie-salliesomething ants."

Cubby looked horrified.

"Oh, is it as bad as that?" he asked tones. "Oh, yes! I will help care for ones. I will go to the Bunny Babies right

"Dear, dear!" he murmured, as he along. "I do hope everyone will be well before little Kiddie Goat comes to visit

Then, at a sudden thought, Cubby stopped and half turned back.

"If I should get mumps, Kiddie Goat visit me, for he might catch them! But on, just the same! I will not be a welcome

The mumps seemed to have come to stay ant Forest to stay.

Almost every day a new case appeared. Busy Beaver was so sick that Brother Beaver sat up with him night and day, and once took off his hat.

Now here, now there, Dr. Squilly Porcupine his faithful helper, Cubby Bear, were til both were so tired they knew not what

Then, one cold afternoon, when the wind and the rain came from the east, Cubby shiver, and felt queer pains in his jaws and

"I—I am afraid I am sick, Dr. Squilly tered. "And I feel sort of dizzy!"

"What, you too?" groaned Squilly. "Come you, and to bed! Mamma Bruin will have to do with you. My checkerberry pills were days ago, and Racky Coon is running low Sometimes I think they do no good, and a doctor must do something."

Cubby plodded along through the rain and when he reached home, the water little streams over Mamma Bruin's floor.

Warm and dry in his little bed at last Mamma Bruin and Grandma Bear hovered ready to do anything they could for him shed bitter tears.

"Is the pain so bad?" asked Mamma Bruin

"No, no!" answered Cubby, "but the little I was expecting, dear little Kiddie Goat not come to see me now!" And he was comforted.

Dr. Squilly came in next day.

"The weather is better today," he said am glad. The clouds are breaking, and sunbeams glinting through. My only new today is Shinyblack Crow, and he has mump—one side of his face, only, is out seen the Baby Bunnies and Betty Badger dren today, and they are feeling well again, all playing around indoors. When the weather is fine, they may go out."

Two days later, there was a knock at and when Mamma Bruin opened it, Cubby a polite little voice asking:

"Is Cubby Bear at home? I have come my promised visit."

Kiddie Goat.

Cubby began to cry.

"Tell him he must not come in, Mamma Cubby called. "I do not want him to get mumps."

But in another moment there was a little hoofs over the floor, and there stood Goat at Cubby Bear's bedside.

"I can come in, and I can stay!" cried joyfully. "I will take care of you, and you, and tell you stories. And I shall sick—for I have had the mumps, and cannot them again!"

Crumbs of Comfort

Do and be.
Act gently.
Live gently.
Silence heals.
Grow ambition.
Learn to praise.
Catch the sunshine.
A promise is a debt.
Optimism parts clouds.
Intolerance is injustice.
Time is the greatest artist.
Nothing lifts life like love.
A glance is love's first word.
Experience means education.
Morning never fails to come.
Put your creed into your deed.
We are never old till we doubt.
Closed books can teach nothing.
A light heart brings a merry day.
A free man binds himself to duty.
The will of God is the will of good.
We get back exactly what we give.
Divide happiness and you multiply it.
Do the most worthwhile thing you know.
The man who fears to-morrow fears life.
Nothing is denied us if we pay the price.
If you have played fair you are a success.
A kind act goes journeying down the ages.
Feed your faith in your own land and its people.
Every hour out of the twenty four can be a success.
Make yourself beautiful in the thoughts of others.
Those that have the most wisdom have the most love.
Enough happiness is wasted to supply the whole world.

FEBRUARY is full of snow and holidays. It is the best month of the winter—if you like winter, as I do and as Billy doesn't. It's a month of tribulation and lamentation to Bill, and no Valentine shower, or any other sort of shower but April one, could be expected to grow a smile ler his whiskers.

Whining can become an unpleasant habit. With rather continuous complaints, Bill reminds me the way Europe is constantly sending us dis- l appeals for aid—to which are added prophe- s of evil to us and the world if the required p is not forthcoming. After having made, as ir various interests dictated, a careful chaos of idealistic plans Wilson took to Paris, the Eu- ean governments, as they had been accustomed doing after less serious wars, hastily pursued eager competition to push their special inter- s and powers. Foreign offices had eyes on oil l coal—and not on peace. Not to aid each er in a salvaging of torn countries and an up- lding of new and fairer relationships became ir objects—it was the same old game of give little as possible and grab all you could. Of rse the result was certain. After a few years this, with constant increase of internal disin- ration, they are ready to turn again to us, cry- that we only (who have grabbed nothing) can e civilization and a "dying Europe."

Of course the truth is that governments, like n, can only be saved by themselves. If their s and ends remain evil, no "saving" of them make them good. They are only saved for re evil. To my notion Europe has never heard ugh of blunt facts from our State Department. ne of this plain speaking would be a medicine hard words and the dose should be given in ge spoonfuls. But plain talk of that sort uld be a breach of courtesy in diplomatic ex- nges between nations, and so our government, e others, seems doubtful of the expediency of peaking its mind" freely lest it give offense. We are not going to "save Europe." Suppose did not exist, with our great free country and vast wealth, what would Europe do then? venture to say she would have to cease trying align us on one side or another of her "saving" d her squabbles—and simply go to work in- nd of so insistently playing alternate bully and gar. There is no country in "dying Europe" ich has not today its labor and its land. Let m use these and forget concessions, alliances d bogies of future wars. On thrones and in eign offices the sword has jingled too long; it not for nothing that movements such as the rising of the Fascisti in Italy have taken place. e people themselves, who are the labor of the rious countries, know instinctively what is eded for their saving. And they look within, t without, by making a housecleaning in high aces where wrong policies have been obstacles real remedies. In no country since the finish the great war has salvation come from gold- ced diplomacy bound and dedicated to old hemes and desir s.

If ever there was a time when we should main- in our traditional policy of keeping out of Eu- pean entangl ments, it is now. And of course shall keep out. But we should speak out at e same time. Europe is and has been a nasty- mpered, greedy child, to whom we are now ked to give sweets and play nursemaid. But ncle Sam has other work to do—and children tter worth caring for. Plain speaking and plain anking are what the crying European baby eds.

And now for the letters:

HATFIELD, R. R. 1, BOX 59, ARKANSAS.

EAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Here I come again! Please don't turn your backs to e, but listen: Since March I've received letters upon tters and have written many letters and used many blets and stamps. There are so many! Please, ncle, let me answer them through dear old COMFORT. or some who wrote were invalids and shut-ins and I pe they will be able to see this in COMFORT.

Some wanted to know about this country. I wish to y this is a fine country. It is healthful, with good ring water all the year round. Strawberries do fine- here as well as corn and cotton. The summer has en awful hot and we have had b g rains—but with damage done. Our summers are always pleasant and ie winters are a model. We had no big snows last inter, but it began to get hot in March. We raise ything here—corn, cotton, wheat, oats, hay, cane, gs, cattle, etc. Arkansas is sure a fine country. We ave the best of neighborhoods around here, with good iendly people. There is plenty of land for sale or to ent and we have lots of fruit and berries. We live bout 24 miles from a mounta n that has a big hotel on . People go up there in the summer and also camp here for their health. We can see the hotel, which ooks like a large rock. At evening, before the sun ets, you can see the sun glisten ng on the windows. t looks like fire.

Some wanted to know about myself and history: I as born and raised in Scott County, Arkansas, and ave lived all my life in Arkansas with my parents—ho were also born and raised in the same county in rkansas. Every member of my family was born and aised in Scott County. I have a mother, father, three rothers and four sisters. One sister is married and two rothers. These are scattered apart. I've a dear rother killed in this bloody war, but his body lies leeping in the dear home state where he loved so well o roam.

I am twenty years old. I am five feet, four inches all and weigh about 133 pounds. I have very dark air, grey eyes, fair complexion and small pearly white eeth. I became deaf when I was seven years old from n attack of the mumps; but no one has to write or nake signs for me to understand. I can read lips ome, as I have said before. Some one was kind enough o send me a treatment, but I know that nothing on earth can heal me from my deafness. Others wanted to know if I were a Christian. Yes, I am a Christian and trying to serve the true living God instead of the God of the world. I know there is one true God and I trust Him more.

I have read many letters from the girls and boys about powder puffs and paint. I agree with Gus Trick and Jack Wilcox, but I say if a girl wants to do as she pleases, why not let her alone? We all have to stand before the coming of a Judge some day. Of course girls should be careful of their ways. I am a girl who cares for the good life and the things that are good and pure. I do not dress in the fashion of the world or like the girls of large cities, for I don't believe in such styles. I have lived in cities for eight years, but I love God's beautiful country and sunshine the best. If girls who are not "all right" think they are, just let them alone. It's their own business. I love all girls, both rich and poor. I think many mothers are to blame as well as girls. I fear by the time this is printed I may be re- ceiving many letters like Jack Wilcox did, but if I do I won't blame them one bit. I don't want to disap- point anybody, but I get disappo nted often myself be- cause I try to do what is right. So, dearest Uncle, I hope you will pardon me and not let Billy get this. I give my hearty thanks to all who wrote to me and if you cousins write to me again, I would like to have you send postage for answers—for there are so many! I will close. Good luck and God bless you, from

Your Loving niece, DELLA TOLLESON.

Della, of course you shall have your chance to tell the Family that you can't keep your outgo- ing mail equal to your incoming—even with the best of wills and fountain pens. They'll forgive you, I'm sure.

You are certainly an Arkansan clear through, Della. We have a lot of Arkansaw cousins in the Big Bunch I have found out, and they all praise their state just as highly as you do. It must be a pretty good place to live—particularly when strawberries are ripe and the cream pitcher handy.

I was not surprised to hear that the big hotel near you looked "like a large rock," Della. There are plenty of summer hotels that are rather rocky spots and about as barren as any rock when it comes to getting three decent meals a day. Very often, too, the beds are hard as a brick, and the proprietor has a heart like a stone—so that the likeness is widened. But I hope your hotel is a soft rock—or perhaps a pudding stone.

Della, there is a pile of instinctive wisdom in what you say on the girl question. And surely if you "love them all, rich and poor," any criti- cism you will make will have the more of kind- ness and justice. We have heard, you know, that the Father you tell us you worship, makes sun- shine for the evil and the good and sends rain on the just and the unjust. When our love is as per- fect and impartial as His, our judgments will be more perfect—and there will be few to make. You must not be "disappointed," Della, at results you get, or fail to get, when you "try to do what is right." If you are true to yourself, if you do not disappoint yourself or God, you should still be able to keep a heart singing in the hills of Scott County. Della, a singing, hearing heart is worth more than the keenest ears in the world. I am sure you have found this out and so have made your deafness but a little burden, if any.

EDANVILLE, MISSOURI.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I have just been reading the League of Cousins de- partment and have decided to write to you for the first time. Uncle, I sure wish you would publish Billy's picture; I'm sure I would like him.

I guess now you wish to know what I look like: I am five feet high, light complexion and blue eyes. I am thirteen years old and have a few freckles on my face. Uncle, have you or any of the cousins got any freckles? And do you know what makes them? Some people say it is by going bareheaded, but I wear a hat all the time. Oh, no; of course I don't mean all the time—I only mean when when I am out of the house.

I live on a farm where we raise all kinds of vege- tables and animals. I had some lettuce for dinner. Do any of the cousins or Uncle Lisha eat lettuce? I sure like it and wish you were here to help me eat.

Uncle, I think you are as nice as your picture. I will close now and I would like to hear from all the cousins.

Your niece and cousin, ETTA HILDEBRAND.

Etta, what makes freckles I think must be as mysterious as what makes red hair. But I think freckles are nice and I really wish I had some. They give a sort of variegated effect to the coun- tenance. I like the little freckles best—those about the size of an old-fashioned three-cent piece. There is a great deal in having your freckles well arranged and I hope you have thought of this with your assortment, Etta. There should be a kind of order without having it look as if the freckles were too stiffly placed. The effect should be what a French cousin would call degage. You should try changing your freckles about un- til you gain just the design you like best. One right on the tip of the nose is always effective. Those freckles which are too large can be trimmed with a pair of sharp scissors and some like a scal- loped style. I don't think going bareheaded has a bit to do with freckles, Etta. For who ever saw a bald-headed man with freckles all over his wide and polished dome? Surely a bald-headed man would be bareheaded enough to get freckles if that had anything to do with the charming sun- spots. No, I think freckles are things which come by grace and they must be worn as gracefully as possible. Of course if you really don't like them, Etta, you can paste a piece of pink court-plaster over each one.

TILLER, OREGON.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

This is my first attempt at writing to the League of Cousins, so please don't let Billy get my letter. I live on a mountain ranch twelve miles from the post office. We have three hundred and twelve and one-half acres of land which is covered with underbrush and pine, fir, cedar and some sugar-pine timber. We have about one hundred and ninety Angora goats, nine milch goats, three horses, four cats, two dogs and a few chickens.

There is much beautiful scenery in this part of the country and hunters come from all over the state and from other states to hunt. There are lots of deer, grouse, quail, pheasants and some bear, cougars, wolves, and many coyotes. There are not many young folks around here, the nearest being at Tiller, twelve miles away.

In the summer time we can get within two miles of our place with a car, but most people go on horseback and bring their things in on a pack horse, as the roads are too muddy for a car in the winter. We are think- ing of getting a car next spring, as the roads are being improved all the time.

I suppose you are wondering what I look like. Well, I am just a country girl, five feet, five and one-half inches tall. I have blue eyes, brown hair, and a fair complexion when it is not too tanned and freckled. Who can guess my age? It is between fifteen and twenty- one.

I would like to hear from any of the cousins that care to write, and I will answer all I can.

As ever, your niece and cousin, DELLA WOOSTER.

Della, you certainly must have the scenery out on your Oregon ranch, and with just enough bears and cougars scattered through the underbrush to make the landscape attractive and the going in- teresting. I was not at all surprised to hear that young folks were scarce out your way and only to be found in the safe streets of Tiller. It ought to be easy for a nice tender boy or girl to stroll off among the sugar pines and not be heard from again—unless an extra thoughtful bear or cougar was kind enough to send a letter or a lock of hair back to the anxious parents. I understand why you keep so many goats, Della. Any foolishly bold cougar who tried to lunch off an Angora would, if he survived, be certain to stick to Tiller boys and girls after such an experience. I hope you will keep close to the ranch or not go out without a goat for a guard, Della. I certainly would not want the number of young folks to be reduced to zero—or to hamburger steak.

You say you can get within two miles of your place in the summer, Della. Well, it must seem nice and homelike to get as close as this, anyway. Probably in the winter you have to live even fur- ther off from your wood stoves and victrola. It must be inconvenient, but I suppose you are used to camping out in the underbrush by now. You can throw stones at your house, at least, or see it by climbing an extra tall sugar pine. Maybe some day you will really be able to get back home again, if you can get an agile Ford to do the climbing.

Della, with all the deer, birds, goats and coyotes you have to eat, you must be fat as well as freckled. I would rather guess at your weight than your age, but I'm pretty sure you are under seventeen years and three months.

SOMEWHERE IN MINNESOTA.

DEAR EVERYBODY:

Well, here I am again—and I hope you aren't all peeved about it. Did I hear one of the cousins say, "That person is the worst mud-slinger I ever saw"? Won't somebody give me a smile or two?—that's fine, Augustus, only a little wider, please. What an ador- able Irish grin Ted has—but Jack won't even look at me (my handkerchief, Annette!). And I'm wearing my prettiest pink dress! It is to weep.

Perhaps you'd like to know just what made me write this third letter? It was a tiny note from Uncle Lisha which he tucked in with a letter from one of the cousins. It was just a little, little personal message from our Uncle, but it made his Uncleship so much more real to me. Uncle Lisha, I'll always keep that wee, short note. Your own handwriting!

But I want to talk to some of the cousins, too. Au- gustus, you surely take the cast iron powder puff! You certainly stick to your point, and I admire you for it. I'm glad you conceded an inch; maybe you do like "us wimmen" just the merest trifle—even if we are vain silly gnats. I like you, anyway. So there! Where did I get the idea you are prejudiced against girls? Here are your own words—I saved your first letter: "I claim that I can have just as g od a time among boys as I can by having a girl hang ng on my arm. This is per- haps due to the fact that I am very bashful in the pres- ence of girls. But if anyone can g ve me a good reason for desiring the company of g rls, maybe I can over- come my bashfulness." Rega d ng that first sentence, I should say it would depend la g y upon the girl who hangs on your arm. And regarding the last sentence, I should love to teach you how to enjoy g rls' company, Augustus, I too think it is unfeminine for g rls to smoke. But I do not think it worse from a moral stand- point for a girl to indulge than for a boy. It is the physical harm which I consider. As for powder, or anything else, there are always some who go to ex- tremes. Aside from the question of whether or not it improve one's looks, powder is a protection from sun and wind. Many men, not "sissies" either, have found this out. I believe there is not one woman in ten thou- sand whose appearance would not be improved by a touch of the right powder. Everyone has a slight face shine which is not always attractive. Please do not think I approve of girls going around looking as if their faces had been whitewashed, with their mouths mere streaks of carmine. I do not. Augustus, powder never hurt a girl who cleansed her face properly before retir- ing. Gus, I have another horrible confession to make; I was afraid to tell it before. Sh!—keep it dark—I have bobbed hair! And oh! the blessed freedom of it. When I think of the years of wasted fussing with my hair, I could weep. All one has to do now is to run one's fingers through it and it is combed. Now, Gus, tell me all the unmoral factors of short hair. I'm all set. And oh! do please let me be the vice president of the Augustus Anti-Cosmetic League which Uncle Lisha suggested it would be a good "trick" for you to found. Please!

Now a few passes at Jack—and he'll be down for the count. I know you don't think much of us, dear boy, in spite of your second letter. You're probably right, though, in your stand. I am very bad-natured, I ad- mit; very contrary, headstrong and willful. But, Jackie, if I could get you alone for five minutes in a dark and more or less secluded nook, I'll wager a lamb's wool powder puff that I could make you tell me I'm sweet (even if I'm not). Conceit? Well, perhaps. Jack, nothing that you said in your letter made me angry. I merely thought: "That poor misguided young man! Surely some hard-hearted girl has trifled with his young affections." But I do not agree with you on the sub- ject of flirting. That many affairs are instigated by women I admit—but nine out of ten—non! All down through the ages man has been saying: "The woman she tempted me." Poor weak creatures! To fall so easily for the female of the species! Is it not to smile? In spite of all this, Jack, I think you aren't half bad. Just a bit "sot" aren't you? I wish you'd like "us" just a little. We made Cousin Augustus retract a bit and hint that "maybe" (but he didn't say it outright) he likes us a tiny bit. You're next! Girls, we like Jack a little—and as much more as he'll let us—don't we? I'm going to tell you COMFORT boy cousins a se- cret—but don't breathe it to a soul that I told you—we girls like a man who comes out boldly and tells us exactly what he thinks of us. It gives us a wonderful chance to argue, and we love to argue.

Well, I'll be good for a long time now, honestly.

Love to all the cousins and Billy, but most of all to Uncle Lisha.

COUSIN RUTH.

Watch the Man

See the changes one week brings

Millions of women know this new way of teeth cleaning. And the pretty teeth seen everywhere now show what it means to them.

If the man doesn't use it, get this 10-Day Tube for him. Then watch the results. See what changes will come in a week.

That dingy film

Most people who brush teeth in old ways have film-coated teeth. A viscous film clings to the teeth, enters crevices and stays. That film becomes discolored, particularly with men who smoke. Then it forms dingy coats. Tartar is based on film.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

No old-type tooth paste can effectively fight film. So all these troubles were constantly increasing, and beautiful teeth were seen less often than today.

New discoveries

Dental science, after long research, has found two ways to fight that film. One acts to curdle it, one to remove it, and without any harmful scouring.

Many careful tests proved these methods efficient. Then authorities endorsed them, and dentists everywhere began to advise their use.

A new-type tooth paste was created, based on modern research. The name is Pepsodent. Then these two great film combatants were embodied in it for daily application.

Not film alone

But Pepsodent brings other great results which research proves essential. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to constantly neutralize the acids which cause decay.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits on teeth which may otherwise ferment and form acids.

Those are Nature's great tooth-protecting forces in the mouth. Every use of Pepsodent gives them manifold power.

Some fifty nations use it now

The use of Pepsodent has spread the world over, largely by dental advice. Careful people of some fifty nations now employ it daily. Thus it is bringing a new dental era. The glistening teeth you see everywhere now show how widely it is used.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

In one week you will gain a new idea of what clean teeth mean. And all in your home will always want those whiter, safer teeth. Cut out the coupon now.

Checks Like This For YOU!

Turn Your Spare Time at Home Into Real Cash!

Gearhart Home Knitting is Your Opportunity

Can you conceive of any easier way to turn your spare time at home into money than to turn a crank handle and watch 100 swift needles knit beautiful Allwear Hosiery and be handsomely paid for the work?

To women everywhere and to men also we say this:—Take up Gearhart Home Knitting, let a delightful occupation engage your spare moments and supply you with the wherewithal to realize cherished dreams. Every day has its moments of gold for you, winter evenings their restful hours which can be made doubly enjoyable by the simple operation of our wonderful home knitting machine.

Gearhart Home Work is not for only a chosen few. It is for all, for you, because you may do it as well as any one of our thousands of Gearhart Home Workers.

The occupation will be just as easy, just as delightful for you as for them and the pay checks you receive can be just as large, perhaps larger, and surely just as much appreciated.

The Gearhart Allwear pay checks of varying amounts have been written daily for years. We do not and never have put the least restraint on the amount of Allwear Hosiery a man or woman might send in. We have paid every cent our long-time contracts called for and have even paid larger amounts when market prices for hosiery made it possible. It is our policy today when we are sending thousands of checks to our coworkers.

What stands between you and your needs? What is to prevent you from earning the tidy sum of money like other Gearhart Workers are receiving? You need only be industrious, ambitious and ordinarily capable to share in the good fortune which Gearhart Checks bring.

Business Ready Made for You

Our records tell a remarkable story of achievement. According to their own letters, invalids and folks physically disabled have found in Gearhart Home Knitting the way to earn good money. What then can you earn who are in possession of your full faculties?

The Gearhart Home Knitter is the original home knitter, the one that made our great home knitting industry possible, the machine perfected as a result of years of experience, the handy machine which can be set anywhere and carried anywhere.

Just how many wonderful things have been accomplished by Gearhart Home Knitting may never be fully known but to us who know what the machine can do, the reports seem not at all extraordinary that tell how home knitting has paid off mortgages, purchased pianos, autos, etc., started bank accounts and made other life desirabilities possible for men and women who had the gumption, courage and determination to take advantage of the opportunity Gearhart points out.

We want to place a Gearhart Home Knitter in your hands so that you can help keep us supplied with Allwear Hosiery. The work comes from you—the money from us.

Dreams Can Come True

Make your dreams come true. It is only a question of how quickly you can do it and that only depends on how much time you can spare and how skillful an operator you can become. Earn all you can or as little as you like, either by sending your work to Gearhart or selling it at handsome prices to friends, neighbors or local stores.

"I learned to knit in one hour,"

Mrs. Patterson	16.94

Thousands of other checks sent to Gearhart Home Workers

The Gearhart Knitting Machine Co. is the birthplace of the ORIGINAL home knitter.

It has been made and improved by us since 1888.

It is the machine on which no previous knitting experience is necessary.

Long-Time Work Contract

The Gearhart Company will sign a contract binding them to accept and pay for all the Allwear Hosiery you can knit or care to send, whether it be a dozen pairs a day or a hundred pairs a week. And nobody pays as high as the Gearhart Company for this particular work in unlimited quantities.

The contract guarantees and protects you. It covers a period of years during which the company is obligated to pay you hundreds of dollars, only provided you send in enough work to cover that amount of pay. Very substantial amounts are paid our workers considering the limited amount of spare time which most of them have. The possibilities, when more time is devoted to the work or where help is secured, are amazing and without limit.

Work as You Please

You are not bound in any way. Your time is always your own to do with as you please. But the Gearhart Company must pay you all you can earn and we are a reputable, long-established firm with a record of many years of honorable dealing. We are involved in no litigation with our home workers for publishing their names, addresses and work records or on account of subjecting them to the annoyance of correspondence with strangers. Our dealings with all are confidential and respected. The Gearhart offer stands on its own merits and has stood the test of time.

Free Yarn

You don't have to run to a store and purchase yarn to start your work. A generous quantity is given free under the terms of our offer and as fast as you send it to us in shape of completed Allwear Hosiery it is replaced free pound for pound.

Full, complete, simplified instructions are furnished so that you can start to earn the minute you learn. You don't have to know the first thing about knitting or machinery. The Gearhart Knitter does the work, you only act as operator and guide, the one who does the simple things the machine cannot do, such as pressing, packing and shipping and receiving your pay check.

Fascinating Home Occupation

You can't work in store, office or factory to earn that extra money and take care of your household duties too. But you can devote your spare time to Gearhart Home Knitting without stepping outside your own door.

Between daylight's dawn and the dusk of twilight are many moments you can find for this pleasing, restful occupation.

"Husband", you might say some evening, if you are a married woman, "knit a little for me while you're resting and I am doing the dishes." And he can do it. "Mary", you say to your little girl, "just turn the crank for mother," and she can do it.

That is how Gearhart Knitting is done after you have started. All want to try it, all want to help you.

You know that you can do as thousands of others have done and nobody should discourage you. Send the coupon at once for full particulars. It may be the turn of the tide of your fortunes. Address:

salary every year for my music and French," said Isabel.

"True, dear, and she will also be very valuable as an interpreter in our shopping and sightseeing expeditions abroad. But to turn to more agreeable things. I want you, Isabel, to do your utmost to make a brilliant match while we are in Europe. With your father's purse, your face, figure and appearance I think you ought to win somebody worth having."

"I hope I may, mamma; I should really enjoy being 'lady' somebody," and the vain girl got up and sailed over to the full-length mirror to survey herself.

"Is it not time for Wilbur to come, mamma?" she asked presently.

Yes; he ought to have been here an hour ago," answered Mrs. Coolidge, glancing at her watch.

Scarce were the words uttered when the doorbell gave forth a clamorous peal; another moment, and there was a manly step on the stair, a deep, rich voice called "Mother! Isabel!" then the door swung open, and the only son and heir was received with open arms and joyous exclamations of greeting.

Wilbur Coolidge was an exceedingly handsome young man of twenty-two years, with a face that challenged all criticism—bright, careless, defiant, full of humor and possessing a gleam of poetry—a face that girls judge instantly and always admire. He had a frank, clear eye of deepest blue, brown hair tinged with gold, a smiling mouth, from which, when he spoke, there gleamed two rows of white, handsome teeth. Yet it was a mouth one could not quite trust—there was something wanting which made one feel that he lacked depth, that there was no great chivalry in his nature, no grand treasure of manly truth, no touch of heroism in his soul. There were few women who would have read him thus critically, yet Brownie did at a glance, when, descending the stairs arm in arm with his sister Isabel, they met face to face, and she was obliged to present him to her.

"My brother, Miss Douglas," she said briefly and coldly, and with a haughty lifting of her head.

Miss Douglas greeted him with quiet politeness, and passed on; but not before she had caught his stare of surprise and look of admiration as his eyes for a moment rested on her face, then swept her dainty form from head to foot.

"And who is Miss Douglas?" he asked, after they had passed beyond her hearing.

"Oh, she is a young person whom grandpa came across in one of the public libraries, and persuaded papa to secure as governess to the girls," Miss Isabel answered, with a yawn.

"Governess! Young person, indeed! Why, if I ever saw the mark of the true and cultured lady in any one, I do in her," he replied with enthusiasm.

"Nonsense, Wilbur! I hope you do not allow your head to be turned by every pretty face you chance to meet."

"Not I," and the young man tossed his head, with a gay laugh. "But this Miss Douglas is something more than pretty. Hers is a face which, if a man learned to love, he would gladly serve twice seven years for the sake of making its owner his wife."

This was said partly to tease his sister, for he well knew her weak points; yet, it must be confessed, he had been startled by Brownie's wondrous beauty.

"Pshaw! Wilbur, I shall get entirely out of patience with you if you run on like that; and let me warn you beforehand, if mamma discovers you are 'sweet' on the governess, it will prove most disastrous to the poor girl's prospects, for she will post her off without any ceremony."

"Don't be disturbed, sister mine. We men, I dmit, have an eye for the beautiful, be it in princess or maid. I suppose I may admire Miss Douglas from a distance, as one would admire a picture, with no thought of possessing it. By the way, to change the subject, what is father going to do with the horses while we are away?"

"Send them up to the farm, I think?"

"When do they go?"

"Monday morning, I think."

"Let us go out to the stable, then, and take a farewell look at them," proposed Wilbur cunningly.

"Not I, thank you! I've no notion of being perfumed with the scent of the stable if any one should call. You can go if you choose, and I will wait for you in the drawing-room."

The young man gladly availed himself of the permission, laughing meanwhile in his sleeve that his artifice had succeeded so well. He did not particularly enjoy a tete-a-tete with the frivolous girl.

He knew well enough that his fastidious sister would not accompany him to the stable, and he longed to be by himself, that he might feast upon the remembrance of that lovely face, which had flashed like a gleam from Paradise upon him.

"She is the loveliest girl I have ever met, and I will see more of her, Isabel and the maternal to the contrary notwithstanding," was his mental resolve, as he paced absently back and forth in the stable, wholly unconscious of his stated object in visiting the place.

CHAPTER XI.

ADRIAN DREDMOND.

The day of sailing came at last.

A good deal of confusion prevailed in getting the family, with their endless supply of luggage, from the Coolidge mansion to the steamer; and in the midst of it all, Wilbur managed several times to escape the Argus eyes of his watchful mother and jealous sister, and get a word with Brownie.

Every hour in her presence only served to enthrall him more hopelessly. He never wearied of looking upon her bright face, nor of listening to the sweet tones of her voice. She wove a spell about him.

Miss Douglas, however, responded very quietly, and with some dignity, whenever he addressed her.

She was observing enough to perceive that his attentions to her were anything but acceptable to the Coolidge family; so, without appearing to do so, she avoided him, and devoted herself to her young charges, Viola and Alma.

But a little incident occurred, just as they were going aboard the steamer, which was to influence the young girl's whole after life.

Brownie was the last to step aboard, excepting Wilbur, and not paying strict heed to her steps, she caught her foot in a coil of rope, stumbled and would have fallen had she not been quickly caught and upheld by a strong arm. The shock was so severe that, overcome with dizziness, she lay almost unconscious for a moment in the stranger's clasp.

"Has she fainted?" asked Wilbur Coolidge, in anxious tones, as he sprang forward, too late to render service.

"I think not. It was only the shock; she will rally in a moment," were the words which Brownie, on coming to herself, heard in such deep, rich tones, that she was conscious of a sudden thrill running through her whole frame.

She opened her eyes, and found herself looking up into a face that was strange, yet familiar.

For one instant her eye met his, and their souls met through that glance. Then, with a vivid blush of shame staining her fair cheek, as she she realized she was being held in the arms of a stranger, Brownie gently disengaged herself and tried to stand alone.

"Brownie Douglas!" the stranger murmured, in wondering surprise, and as if the words were forced from him by some previous memory.

As she caught them, the color again flew to her face, and he, seeing her embarrassment, hastened to say:

"I beg your pardon, but my surprise made me forget myself. Will you take my arm and allow me to conduct you below? I fear you are not quite strong yet."

"Thank you," Brownie began, when Mr. Coolidge suddenly interfered.

"I will attend to the lady, sir, thanking you kindly for the service you have already rendered her," he said somewhat haughtily and offered Miss Douglas his own arm.

She took it, and with a grateful look at the strange gentleman, and one more rapid glance into his fine eyes, she allowed Mr. Coolidge to lead her away.

"Who was that gentleman, Miss Douglas?" Mr. Coolidge demanded, with a grave look, after they had left him, and he was carefully assisting her down the companionway.

"I do not know; I have never met him before, and yet——" was Brownie's hesitating reply, while her face wore a puzzled look.

"And yet what?" asked the young man, willing to speak carelessly, yet with the vexed frown.

"It seems to me as if I have seen his face before some time, but where, I do not remember." But the perplexed look still remained upon her countenance.

"He seemed to know you. He called you 'Brownie Douglas.' Is that your name?"

The color flamed again into her cheeks at the question. She had noticed the stranger's momentary utterance of her pet name, and had been strangely moved by it.

"It used to be when I had dear friends."

She grew sad and pale again at the memories which came thronging upon her at the mention of the dear old name.

"I cannot understand, though, how he did come to know it," she added, after a moment.

"Brownie—Brownie—it just suits you, Miss Douglas," said Mr. Coolidge, taking in at a admiring glance the shining coils of brown hair, the liquid chestnut eyes, and the long, dark lashes which just now half concealed them.

"My name is Mehetabel Douglas, Mr. Coolidge," Brownie said coldly and with dignity, not appreciating his familiarity, nor the tender caress in his voice had assumed.

He laughed aloud.

"Pardon me," he said, "but such a name for you is an abomination. Don't you ever shorten it?"

"I do not think it is very euphonious either, Mr. Coolidge, and therefore when I was a child I shorten it into Meta," she explained, smiling at his indignation, and disarmed by his frankness.

"That is quite respectable. But what is the matter? I fear you have not recovered from your fall yet. Are you sure you are not injured?" he asked anxiously, seeing she had grown very white again.

"No; but it gave me quite a shock, and I think the motion of the boat prolongs the dizziness. But I shall do very well if I can only sit——"

"If this gentle swaying affects you so, I don't know what you will do when we come to sail," he replied, as he hastened toward the saloon with her.

Here they found the rest of the family, anxious at their non-appearance; and Mr. Coolidge and Isabel were not in the best frame of mind for the world when they saw the governess coming leaning upon the arm of Wilbur.

"Miss Douglas has had a fall, mother, and is faint; please let her have your vinaigrette," he explained as he carefully seated her upon a couch.

"Thanks, but I have one," Brownie said, and straightway produced one from her little work-bag, which caused Miss Isabel's pale eyes to expand with wonder.

It was a costly little trifle of solid gold, and the stopple was curiously formed and set with pearls.

She prized it and loved to use it because it had been one of the things which had been presented by Miss Mehetabel.

"Do look, mamma! Wherever did she get it?" whispered Isabel.

"I'm sure I don't know, child; evidently she longed to a different sphere in life before she came to us. I only wish your grandfather had been at the poles that night she went to the library to beguile him with her pretty face," turned the maternal Coolidge impatiently.

"Oh, you begin to think she is pretty, do you?" sneered her dutiful daughter.

"Wilbur evidently thinks so, if I do not," the moody reply.

Brownie's quick ears had caught every word, and she very coldly refused the glass of wine which the young man in question at that moment brought her.

She then settled herself upon the couch, closed her eyes, thus intimating her desire to be left alone.

Upon the deck above them there paced a young man, with bent head and thoughtful brow.

He was tall and exceedingly well formed, broad, full chest and square shoulders giving the impression of great strength and power of endurance.

He looked the Englishman every inch, and a very noble one withal.

He was not handsome, like Wilbur Coolidge, but he possessed a face of decision and truth.

He had deep, thoughtful gray eyes, a firm mouth with kindly lines about it, and an expression of great firmness and character withal. He was a true, good face—a face to be trusted in any circumstances.

"How does she happen to be here, I wonder?" he muttered, with a far-away look out over the waters. "I know she left Philadelphia soon after her aunt's death," he continued, "and though I tried hard to find where she had gone, I could not. She faded out of the fashionable world in which she used to move as completely and suddenly as a fallen star drops out of existence. I'm glad now I did not leave the matter with him, as he wished me to do; no, I'll keep her to her with my own hands, or I will keep her never!"

He walked absently to the side of the steamer and stood looking into the turbid waters below, and not long after two ladies drew near, and he overheard the following conversation:

"Mamma, I tell you we shall have trouble with that governess as sure as the world."

"I hope not," replied the elder lady, with a troubled look.

"Wilbur is over head and ears in love with her already, and it will be just like her to lead him on for the sake of gaining a good position in the world," and the young lady's tone was exceedingly disagreeable.

"Well, it cannot be helped now; you must make yourself so interesting and agreeable that he will prefer your society to that of any one's else; he must monopolize him during the voyage, and when we are once settled, I will see that she does not have any spare time to flirt."

"Talk about her having a fall," continued Isabel Coolidge indignantly. "Alma saw the whole proceeding, and says it was nothing but a scramble. She said a gentleman caught her, and saved her from going to the floor, and she lay back in his arms as helplessly and gracefully as any heroine in a novel."

"I have not much doubt that she is artful, and would not scruple to take advantage of Wilbur's weakness for pretty faces, notwithstanding she appears so meek and demure."

"Meek and demure, mamma! Why, she is anything but that. She has the manners and bearing of a little queen!" interrupted Miss Coolidge.

"Well, but she is very quiet, and does not appear to be seeking his attentions; but, as I said before, we cannot help it now; all we can do is to watch them closely."

"Never fear but that we can do that with our sharp eyes; and with you and I both on the look out, I reckon we can manage them," laughed the young lady.

"Yes; and if we find any indications of anything serious upon Wilbur's part, I will find some excuse for shipping her off our hands as soon as we land. I will not have my son's prospects ruined by a poverty-stricken governess," replied the haughty woman sternly.

They moved away from the place where Brownie had been standing, and the young Englishman

On St. Valentine's Day in the Evenin

By Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

EMMETT Sheridan stood at the office window looking across the expanse of snow-laden roofs where the roaring blizzard played like white wildfire around the black chimneys. It was only four o'clock, but the driving storm had cast a pall over the city and already numerous lights twinkled through the precipitation.

There was nothing in the prospect to indicate that it was St. Valentine's Day, the "day of belles and beaux," yet it was, in fact, February 14th, and it was the very fact that it was St. Valentine's Day that Emmett Sheridan now stood as he did, for there was about him an attitude of indecision that indicated a mental struggle, and that mental struggle was with reference to a St. Valentine's dance that he was supposed to attend that evening.

Some weeks before he had received an invitation to attend Esther Parkside's valentine cotillion, and he had eagerly accepted and immediately sought the privilege of escorting Marian Drew, and he was in a seventh heaven (whatever that is) when she had accepted his escort.

But a thorn had suddenly developed on the rose, a thorn he had not bargained for, and that was the presence of Vandeventer Schuyler of New York.

Schuyler was a visitor at the Drew home and, as a guest, Marian had given much of her time to entertaining him. There seemed to be some gigantic business proposition on the hands of Mr. Drew in which Schuyler was deeply interested, in fact so much so that he made his home with the Drews instead of putting up at a hotel as any normal man would.

There was really no reason why Esther Parkside should have invited Schuyler to the affair, nor why he (Schuyler) should have "rung in" on his (Sheridan's) escort.

"Wonder if he sent her a valentine?" Sheridan mused savagely as he glared out at the snowy prospect. "Great guns, whoever started the legend that birds selected their mates on this day? Imagine Robin Redbreast going to call on Jennie Wren to propose on a day like this!"

His mind turned to an old verse that had been running through his mind all day:

"Apollo has peeped through the shutter,
And awaken'd the witty and fair;
The boarding-school belle's in a flutter,
The two-penny post's in despair;
The breath of the morning is flinging
A magic on blossom, on spray,
And cockneys and sparrows are singing
In chorus on St. Valentine's Day."

He had come across the verse while looking for an appropriate one to send with his love offertory, three dozen gorgeous American Beauties, and now it persisted in his mind, probably because it was so direct a contrast to the storming elements outside.

He wondered how Marian had received his valentine and wondered if she would think him a romantic cub, since he had finally selected a bit of doggerel to accompany his gift:

"This Valentine comes
From a heart that is true,
Faithful and loving Forever—to you."

Of course, it was done in a spirit of mischief, and of course Marian would take it in similar spirit!

All of which shows that Sheridan, in spite of all the common sense a hard-headed young business man is supposed to possess, and must if he has made the strides in the business world that Sheridan had, was hopelessly enmeshed.

Should he cancel the engagement? Confound it, he didn't want to be a second fiddle. He would be the obvious escort, but Schuyler, darn him (he didn't say darn him, though!) would, no doubt, receive practically all of Marian's attention.

He grabbed up the telephone but ere he had the receiver off the hook he put the instrument down again. What! Give up the field? Not he! He'd go and lose fighting rather than lose by running away. And with a grin, a toss of his head, a shrug of his shoulders and a hopeless lift of his eyebrows, the decision was formed, and his attitude indicated that he was taking comfort in the fact that men in love were supposed to act foolishly.

The decision proved to him conclusively how hopelessly in love he was and that he wanted Marian Drew more than he ever wanted anybody in his life.

He was in love! He had, at one time, wondered how it felt to be in love and when he thought of his experience with little Billy Van Allen the night the youngster had been refused, he realized the little fellow's feelings and sympathized now with him in his wish to do something desperate. Then, though, he had not let the youngster see that he felt a somewhat contemptuous pity for him, but had, instead, bolstered up his courage, soothed him as a mother might, until Billy had fallen asleep. The next day Billy tried his luck again in accordance with Sheridan's advice, the young lady reconsidered her decision and accepted Billy, who accordingly flew to a seventh heaven (again we ask whatever that is). Thus Sheridan had a glimpse of the two extremes of love and was beginnfng to realize that there was something very tantalizing in this all overpowering emotion.

Darkness had now fallen, so he dressed for the street and plunged into the storm without. He hailed a taxi and soon was at home, where, after dinner, he proceeded to array himself in his dress clothes. A thrill of pride pervaded him as he surveyed himself, and perhaps he can be forgiven since he possessed a splendid physique, and his well-groomed person looked godly, if indeed the gods ever went about in dress clothes.

Then he started for the Drew home.

Jerry, the butler, let him in and told him to please step to the library, Miss Marian wasn't down-stairs yet, but would he please join Mr. Schuyler?

Accordingly, Sheridan went to the library, where he found Vandeventer Schuyler. Schuyler was of slighter build than Sheridan, but there was a determination in his general attitude which indicated that he could be a hard proposition to bump up against. Still, at the present time, he seemed all affability, and there was a curious little twinkle in his eye which denoted the tease. He was probably a half-dozen years older than Sheridan (who was twenty-seven), which seemed to make Sheridan's clean-cut virility the more pronounced.

Schuyler arose as Sheridan entered, graciously held out his hand and, after greeting each other, they chatted of inconsequential things until Marian came down.

Sheridan was aware of the fact that he involuntarily caught his breath as he beheld her. The fashion that had decreed long skirts had been followed by its devotees and Marian was among the first to adopt it. Consequently she appeared in a gown of white and silver, draped to the ankles, which gave her a statuesque beauty. But she was all unconscious of her charm. In her easiness of carriage and quiet self-possession she was a true exponent of American aristocracy.

She held out her hand to Sheridan.

"Thanks so much for the flowers, Emmett," she said simply, "it was sweet of you to remember the day. Aren't they lovely?" and she nodded toward the flowers in a vase on the floor.

"I thought you might think me silly," he returned, feeling embarrassed as he thought of the doggerel scribbled on the card.

"No, I rather liked it. It brought back my little-girl days and the gaudy valentines I always received. But isn't it nearly time to go?" and she picked up her elaborate wrap.

Sheridan sprang to assist her, and in a few moments they were ensconced in his limousine.

"To whom shall you give your first dance, Miss Drew?" Schuyler queried mischievously. "You have two escorts who are both pining for the privilege. Do you recall that opera, 'The Bartered Bride'? There is a dance in it known as the Furiant in which one man dances with two girls. I suggest that it be revised so that one girl may dance with two men. But until that time, we'll have to settle the matter as men do—by tossing a coin. What say, Sheridan?"

"I'm game," Sheridan replied, producing a coin and making a selection, he flipped it. The decision was in Schuyler's favor.

"Miss Drew, with your permission, the dance is mine," Schuyler said.

"Very well, we'll let the Fates' decision stand," she laughed.

They soon reached the Parkside house, the windows of which looked like burnished gold through the falling snow. They drew up before the striped awning over the walk, descended and went into the house.

There was a great crowd already assembled, and group after group left the dressing-rooms for the great ballrooms of the Parkside home.

Sheridan and Schuyler soon divested themselves of their wraps and then waited in the hall for Marian and when she appeared they went to the ballroom with her.

Here Esther had allowed her decorators to run riot in carrying out the valentine idea. In the four corners of the room were elaborate pedestals upon which groups of Cupids were variously posed, holding in their hands the ends of white silk streamers which were carried toward the ceiling by flocks of white doves, wings outspread. Darted hearts were everywhere in evidence, and the entrances and exits of the ballroom were so cleverly decorated that one had the impression of stepping into the heart of a valentine.

One by one the immense hearts were pierced.

And now the dancing commenced. With a commiserating look, Schuyler took Miss Drew in his arms and they one-stepped away, so Sheridan comforted himself with little Miss Parkside, who, though she was not "out," slipped in in spite of admonitions to the contrary.

Esther will scold me dreadfully, Mr. Sheridan, for committing such a faux pas, but I don't care. Flappers must flap," she giggled.

There happened to be many "stags" (men who had not escorted a lady), so that Sheridan found himself left over every now and then. Not that he cared particularly, for, had it not been for the looks of the thing, he would not have danced with anyone but Marian.

So it was during one of these interludes that he strolled into one of the other rooms and sat down on a divan for a smoke, knowing permission was being mutely given, since there was a smoking-stand and cigarettes near by.

He had just taken one and had it poised half way to his lips and was about to strike a match, when Miss Estelle Franklin approached.

In a spangled robe that threw off radiant flashes, she was as glorious as any Christmas tree. She was an undeniably beautiful girl, but there was a hardness about her beauty and a certain forwardness of manner which, while within the bounds of propriety, had an unpleasant effect upon whom it was practiced. This manner of hers was notorious and all eligible bachelors ran when she approached. Sheridan knew he was in for it, but he wasn't afraid of any woman (provided he wasn't in love with her) and so he felt equal to Miss Estelle.

"Moping here all alone, Mr. Sheridan?" she began.

"Not necessarily moping—no," he replied coolly. "Marian has a double escort tonight and that gives me a little time that I otherwise might not have."

"Doesn't she look too perfectly beautiful tonight?" Estelle questioned, seating herself on the divan with him. "You may smoke if you like," she interpolated.

"Will you join me?" he queried, fighting her familiarity with her own weapon.

"You naughty boy," she scolded pleasantly, "you know I never indulge. Do you know what sort of novelties Esther will have for the cotillion?"

"No, but I dare say they will have to do with St. Valentine's Day."

"If you'll not breathe a word, I'll tell you. For the piece de resistance she has immense red hearts as tall as you men. You hide behind these and march into the ballroom. The girls are given bows and quivers of arrows and we are to aim at these red hearts. Whichever heart we pierce, that heart we have won—for the evening—and its owner must take us to supper. What do you think of it?"

"Clever, except that I know of several engaged couples who will feel quite dreadfully put out if they cannot have supper together. They probably will not care for substitute valentines since they have already made their selections."

"That's true. Dear me, how I wish I could get the thrill out of valentine gifts that I got out of the trashy little lace valentines that the boys sent me when I was at school. Bouquets and candy do not carry the same sentiment, do they?"

"No, I suppose a girl doesn't get the thrill that those old-time valentines, made up of hearts and lace and colored celluloid and done up in a pasteboard box as big as an automobile top, gave. How eagerly they must have looked for the postman."

"I suppose you sent a valentine today?" she queried archly.

"Why, naturally," he responded again, as coolly as before. "Did you receive it?"

She laughed outright. "Of course I didn't," and there was a little bitterness in her tone, nevertheless, "valentines have come in less and less numbers each year until the postman quite overlooked me today."

"It is your own fault then," Sheridan replied gallantly, but there was a double meaning to his words. Estelle was too eager, too anxious to give herself away.

But she took it in the complimentary sense.

"How nice of you to say that," she responded, "but I must go for I believe I am due to have this dance with Mr. Schuyler."

She rose, then leaned toward him confidentially. "Do tell me, Emmett, is he engaged to Marian Drew? The rumor has persisted for the last week."

Sheridan felt a coldness grip his heart. But always in command of himself, he answered quietly:

"I've heard nothing of it. Have you asked Marian?"

"Why, she's probably the last person who will hear of it. Don't you know that you are always the last person to hear rumors about yourself?" and with a coquettish flirt of her hand, indicating that he need not see her to the ballroom, she moved away, her gown emitting flashes as brilliant as lightning.

Sheridan sat for a quarter of an hour or more wondering if, indeed, there was any truth to the rumor. He had no claim upon Marian, and possibly he had only imagined that she had been encouraging, men were prone to regard little attentions as marks of favor.

So he mulled for a while until a man servant approached and asked him to step to the ballroom as the cotillion was about to commence.

He joined in it gaily, favored lavishly and was in turn favored, until the novelty of the evening was reached.

This was even as Estelle had described it. Each man was given a huge red heart, as tall as himself, and concealing himself behind it so that only his dancing pumps and perchance a few inches of dress trousers showed, he marched into the ballroom, and crossed the floor while a volley of arrows was aimed at him by the inexperienced archers.

Amid much shrieking, the feathery little arrows sped across the ballroom and one by one the immense hearts were pierced.

But fate seemed to be against Sheridan for somehow no one seemed to be able to dart his heart and he was one of the leftovers. Schuyler had been hit by Gloria Treavor and Marian had secured little Billy Van Allen. As Gloria had been the cause of Billy's wild despair and subsequent happiness, it was easy for him to change partners so Schuyler was the one to take Marian to supper.

Sheridan stood in the hall, along with several other "stags" and nonchalantly lit a cigarette and smoked as the couples filed by him.

"Hard luck, old chap," was addressed to him commiseratingly several times, but he only smiled complacently. He knew how to take everything with sang froid.

When the supper file had disappeared into the dining-room, he sat down upon a divan to finish his smoke. The other unattached men wandered away and left him alone. Somewhere in the house a bell rang, but he paid no attention to it. His eyes wandered about the hall where, ranged against the walls, the immense hearts were parked in various stages of dilapidation. His alone stood, untouched.

He looked at it for a moment and self-pity touched him.

"Untouched, unwanted. Evidently I am not much of a catch—bah, you simpleton, you ing is worthy of a calf!"

Just then he was aware of footsteps ing, and looking up he saw Marian

"Feeling neglected and alone?" she

"Yes," he said. It was pleasant to sympathy of her voice.

"Then perhaps you would like to with me?"

"Well, I don't know if I have the darts couldn't reach my heart——"

He had begun in a teasing manner denly he was aware of a tenseness ation and looking up at her saw face that shamed him.

"My words are worthy of a cad he said. "Pray forgive them. I cause I thought that they had place at the table beside you Schuyler to take care of."

"You heard the bell? That summoning him to New York is very ill."

"His wife?" exclaimed Sheridan.

"Why—why, Emmett! Didn't he was a married man?"

"You never told me!" Sheridan we presume a man is single married! Why, only tonight asked me if it were true to Schuyler."

"How absurd! But just wait Schuyler again! I always little peculiarity in his manner marked during the evening derstand you! 'Surely me, he knows I'm married!' is what he said. The tease! Gray Hair—Stop It!
—Here is the way

Mary T. Goldman's Hair Color Restorer isn't a new experimental preparation, for I invented it many years ago to restore my own prematurely gray hair. It is a clear, colorless liquid, clean as water, which restores the perfect original color to graying, bleached or discolored hair; perfect results assured. No interference with shampooing, nothing to wash or rub off, but soft, clean, fluffy, natural hair which renews your youth.

Now I have discovered a new method of application which hastens results and improves the health of the hair. Fully explained in my free trial outfit, containing trial bottle of restorer with full directions for making test on single lock. Mail coupon for free bottle today and let me prove how easily, quickly and surely your gray hair can be restored.

In the coupon be sure to state the color of your hair carefully. Enclose lock of your hair if possible.

Don't Spoil Your Child's Hair By Washing It

When you wash your child's hair be careful what you use. Many soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much free alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It is very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces.

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water is all that is required. Simply moisten the hair with water, and rub the Mulsified in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy and easy to manage. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff. You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any drug store, and a few ounces will last everyone in the family for months. Be sure your druggist gives you Mulsified.

To Dye or Not to Dye

WHEN the first gray hair begins to put in its appearance, it is something of a shock, on glancing into one's mirror, to recognize the marks of what we all wish we could escape—increasing age. But, there is the hair; it is gray; and what are we going to do about it?

There are many ways of answering this question, and one of the ways is through the process of dyeing; but my principal object this month is to preach against just this thing..

There is a temptation, I suppose, to conceal the first gray hair or two, though for myself I do not mind them; but granting that all people do not feel as I do, the thing to be considered is whether the purpose of concealing the results of the years is really accomplished through the process of dyeing.

In most cases, the effect is quite the opposite. One's skin, one's eyes, one's hair, have all been chosen by Nature to make a harmonious whole, and any attempt to alter the "color scheme" is disastrous. With henna—ed hair, the eyes and skin which went with black or blonde hair are sadly out of the picture. Of course, if one dyes one's hair its own original shade, there is not the same objection to the result, but here again, one must consider whether dyeing, in any case, is successful. I must say, frankly, that ordinarily it is not. An amateur can ruin hair permanently, for remember that dye alters for all time the color of your hair; you can never get back your hair as it was, unless you wait until you have an entire new stock of hair grown from nothing into something. A professional beauty expert can dye your hair so that it is all one color, but here again, you have to consider many things. First, your hair will grow, and as a result the new portion of your hair, from the scalp outward, will be of a different color from the rest of your hair. This necessitates constant "touching up." Next, if you do not like the effect, it cannot be changed. Third, the chemicals used in dyeing sometimes leave the hair in such condition that an ordinary shampoo will change its color. This happened to an acquaintance of mine whose hair was dyed by one of the most expert people in this country, but who upon being given a shampoo in another beauty shop some months later, found her hair turned a bright purple—because of some chemicals used in the shampoo, and also in the dyeing.

I knew another woman who had lovely white hair. She was comparatively young and did not like the white hair, thinking it made her look old. (There she was mistaken, for it made her skin look fresh and her eyes bright.) She yielded to the persuasion of a beauty shop and allowed a little henna to be put in the water to rinse her hair after a shampoo "just to put a little color into it". As a result, her hair was ruined; its lovely soft whiteness was gone forever, and all that was left was a dirty yellow, dry and harsh. She can never get back the lovely hair she had, and all that is left to her now is to dye it; this will make her face at once look years older, for it will be out of harmony with the brightness of dyed hair.

Give the hair every possible attention; shampoo it, brush it, massage the scalp, look after the health of the body, dress the hair becomingly, and see that it is always soft and lustrous; then cease from worrying about its color; it is without doubt the right color for your skin and eyes, and if it is kept lustrous, spotlessly clean, well dressed, it is more becoming to you than any result of the art of the dyer.

Answers to Questions

MICHIGAN.—How shall you care for your hair? Well, my dear, first you want to keep the scalp clean, which means that you should shampoo it once in two weeks, or three weeks at the most, using warm water in which shaved white soap has been thoroughly dissolved. First, wet your hair and scalp thoroughly, after combing out any snarls, then pour on it some of this liquid, and rub thoroughly with the fingers, making a thick lather. Rinse out this lather, then use more liquid, more rubbing, more rinsing, then once more a supply of the liquid, much more rubbing, seeing that every inch of the scalp has been thoroughly rubbed and cleansed, then rinsing many, many times. The chief thing in shampoos is to rinse the hair thoroughly, as if any of the soap remains it clogs the little pores in the scalp. Having planned to have regular shampoos, and to dry your hair in the sunlight when possible—never, never putting it up until it is dry and warm—the next thing is to take care of it daily. Before you go to bed, let it down and comb it gently, then brush with equal gentleness until the hair is smooth and shiny. Braid loosely and go to bed. Brush gently again in the morning when doing up your hair. Since you are only fourteen, I should do my hair very simply. Really, hair braided down the back is a very good way to wear it. You can part your hair in the middle, then across the head from ear to ear, and take each half of the front hair, rolling it a little as you draw it away from the forehead, then braiding the ends in with the back hair. Or you can part it a little on one side, if you like. Many young girls have their hair bobbed, part it on one side, and comb toward the other side, using a barrette or bow of ribbon to hold the longer hair in place as it is combed over to the opposite side in this manner. The hair must be specially cut for this way of wearing it, however, because some of the hair needs to be long and some short, as you can see. I should, I think, keep my hair the length it is, snip off any broken ends where they are split, shampoo it often, brush it gently every day, and wear it down my back in a braid with the ends left loose, and a big bow tied next the head. If your skin is tanned, let it be so. A young girl of your age looks better with a skin that suggests she has plenty of healthy outdoor life. Keep the skin thoroughly bathed —bathe yourself all over every day; if you haven't a bathtub in the house, you can scrub your body with a wash-cloth and with nothing more than a washbowl to help out. Stand on a folded bath towel. Keeping the entire body skin perfectly clean and sweet in this way is the best thing in the world for both the complexion and the health. Rinse the body thoroughly, especially the face. If you will keep scalp and body clean in this way, and your face as fresh and sweet as possible, your skin, even though tanned, will look so clear as to be lovely. Do not rub soap on the face. You may use some in the water, but do not put it on the cloth or face.

TORRINGTON.—The shampoo you are using is perfectly all right. Be careful about rinsing the hair thoroughly, however. You say your health is good, but also speak of some stomach trouble. Get after that, first of all, for neither hair nor any other feature of the body will be just as good as it should be if your stomach is not operating properly. Try lying down for a time after meals, if you can possibly. I know this is many times impossible, but if you know that rest and relaxing is what you need, perhaps you will manage to work it in sometime during the day. Eat simple foods, so that your stomach is not asked to do more than it is able to do. I should judge that you were below par in health and in weight. Try eating very slowly and chewing your food until it is liquid. For breakfast eat only a couple of soft-boiled eggs or soft poached eggs, and some bread that has been dried and browned in the oven, then lightly buttered. This kind of "toast" is really very appetizing and it is easily digested, whereas white bread or toast the center of which is fresh is difficult of digestion for a delicate stomach. You could eat with this some grapefruit, or a baked apple, or a dish of stewed prunes, but if either of the latter eat them very slowly indeed and chew each mouthful over and over. Cut out coffee and tea, and drink water half an hour before your breakfast, letting it be hot. For lunch again eat simple things—a baked potato, some spinach, some tomato toast—if tomato does not disagree with you—a bowl of oyster stew, beef broth—any of these. You could, for instance, take a bowl of beef broth or oyster stew, then a baked potato and a dish of baked custard. For supper, you could eat a broiled chop or some roast meat, with some vegetable well cooked, and a simple dessert. The main thing you have to remember is to avoid white bread, chew your food, eat not many things at a meal, cut out coffee, tea, sweets—do not eat pork or veal—and eat slowly, and rest after a meal if you can. Now for your hair—though all this advice is given you to help your hair as well as your general health—shampoo it once in three weeks, and massage the scalp night and morning. To do this, let the hair down, brush it gently, then slip the fingers of the right hand under the hair on the right side of the head, and the fingers of the left hand under the hair on the left side of the head. Press firmly against the scalp, and move it back and forth on the skull, without lifting the fingers. Move the fingers from place to place on the scalp, repeating this massage each time, until the entire scalp has been gone over. If the skin is tight on the skull, the blood cannot circulate properly, so it must be kept loose, and the circulation of blood to the scalp stimulated by the friction of massage. I am inclined to think, however, that your main trouble is with your general health and that your hair will improve when you have overcome the stomach condition and built yourself up to proper weight and strength.

STELLA.—Any cream can cause blackheads, if the pores are not thoroughly cleansed daily, because if the pores are filled with cream which is not removed, dust settles on the cream and the cream hardens and there you have blackheads. I suggest that you bathe your face in very warm water, laying cloths over it to soften the contents of the pores, then that with a soft towel about the forefinger of each hand, you press out the contents of the pores. Keep at it until they are emptied then touch them with alcohol or peroxide or even witch-hazel. Every time you wash your face, be sure that there is nothing left in the pores. A gentle massage night and morning, your fingers very lightly dipped in cold cream, will tend to stimulate the pores to action. After bathing the face in warm water, always rinse it in cool water for the last rinsing, so that the pores may be coaxed to close.

SPRINGFIELD.—Do you use a very strong soap for shampoo? It would perhaps make your scalp dry and cause dandruff. Use a mild soap, shaving it into hot water and dissolving for shampoo mixture. Do you drink plenty of water so that your body has sufficient liquid? Plan to drink not less than eight or ten glasses of water daily, but not at meals. Sip the water, not take it rapidly. Massage of your scalp, as I have directed "Torrington," will be an aid. Dip your fingers into oil before massaging. It would be a good idea for you to take an oil shampoo, by which I mean to anoint the scalp with olive oil the night before shampooing. You can use a medicine dropper and parting the hair in many places run the dropper back and forth along the parts. This puts oil on the scalp but not on the hair itself. Then tie up your head in a towel before going to bed. In the morning, shampoo. The oil will soften the dandruff and make it easier to cleanse the scalp. Massaging each night with a tiny bit of oil on the fingers will also help conditions, but if you use much oil your hair will be greasy; also if you brush the hair much after massaging you will spread the oil over the hair surface. If you were very courageous you would anoint hair and scalp, and keep your head tied in a towel for an entire afternoon; go to bed with the oil still on and shampoo the next morning. Be careful of your foods. Eat plenty of fruit and green vegetables, not too much of what we call "concentrated foods" like meat.

A YOUNG MOTHER.—I would not try to reduce while baby is nursing, but after she is no longer dependent upon you for food, you should get to work in earnest and lose about forty pounds! You are probably eating too many of the fat-building foods. And what probably makes you short of breath when climbing stairs. When you do not need to provide milk with milk, then cut out sweets altogether for a time, also cut out potatoes, rice, macaroni, fat meats and vegetables. There is plenty left to eat: for breakfast eat boiled eggs, fruit of some kind such as grapefruit, oranges, a baked apple, or prunes soaked all night and cooked for an hour or more slowly. Do not eat bananas. And there is fish, and lean roast beef, and lamb and mutton, and chicken, but no pork or veal; and there are all kinds of vegetables such as string beans, asparagus, and onions, and celery, and corn, and lima beans and peas, and carrots. Some of these have more building properties, but not to any great extent. Use little or no butter, milk, cream, and no sugar, no white bread. And, of course, you should exercise. As given and give constantly many exercises in Comfort practice them.

A READER.—I imagine your circulation is not good. You do not tell me how old you are. When one gets between forty and fifty, almost every woman has the experience of which you are now complaining, and there is nothing to do except to bear it and wait until it "outgrows itself." Some physicians prescribe thyroid extract at that time, but it must be prescribed by a competent physician or harm is done. If you are a young woman, then there is no such reason for your difficulty. And what you must do is to try to improve your circulation." First and foremost, you must be sure that no portion of your clothing is tight about sleeves, collars, corsets, belts. Perhaps you do not wear a corset, so many women these days have discarded them, their slender figures making this possible. It would be a good idea for you, if you do not need to, But, if you must wear them, be careful that you do not draw the strings tight. Wear a low-busted corset that comes only a couple of inches above the waist line, leaves only the chest and bust free and unrestricted. Next see that the bowels move freely at least once a day, and better twice. Drink plenty of water and eat fresh fruits to facilitate a free and healthy action of the bowels. Do not eat heavy meals; eat light meals, well masticated and well chosen. Exercise night and morning for ten or fifteen minutes, to keep your circulation in good order. You speak as if the burning in your face only took place when you were in a warm room; this may be because you are full-blooded. You do not tell me what you weigh, but if you are a person of good weight, I should say there is where your trouble lies. Perhaps you need to reduce. Think it over. I am advising you in the dark, because I do not know your age, weight or your general health, and therefore I can only advise you generally.

FERN C.—See what I have said to "Springfield." Practice scalp massage every night before going to bed. Look after your food and your general health, for all the health of the hair must come from the body. I should say your body needed to be built up; that you were not quite as strong and well as you should be. How about it? If you will eat proper foods, so that you are well nourished, take exercise so that your circulation is kept in good order, massage the scalp to bring the blood there, and be careful not to use soap on the hair, the conditions of which you complain should be overcome.

CAMBRIDGE.—Do you use soap on your face and your little daughter's face? I would not do so, in view of the trouble you are having. Get some good cold cream and morning and night rub it over the face, then wipe it off with a bit of soft cloth. This will cleanse the pores of dirt, and soften it; be sure, however, that all of the cream is removed. Once in a few days you can steam the face with water, but no soap. Use rolled oats which half fill a little bag about four inches long and three wide. Close the bag with stitches, and use it as a wash-cloth, dipping it into water, then rubbing the face with it. It will cleanse, but leave the skin soft. I gave directions for making these bags in the last number.

Gray Hair banished in 15 minutes

INECTO RAPID

Thousands of American tourists have brought "INECTO-RAPID" from Europe. It can now be obtained in America. Its progressive features represent a distinct advantage over all other hair coloring preparations.

"INECTO-RAPID" is used exclusively by 97% of the best European beauty parlors. The finest Beauty establishments in America have now adopted it.

"INECTO-RAPID is specifically guaranteed to color gray, faded or streaked hair to its original shade in fifteen minutes. The color is absolutely permanent. It is so natural it cannot be detected from nature even under a microscope. It cannot injure the hair, or interfere with growth. "INECTO-RAPID" is the discovery of Dr. Emile of the University of Paris, and differs absolutely from all other hair colorings because it repigmentizes the hair shaft instead of only coating the surface.

Thousands of women apply it in the privacy of their own homes with perfect success.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half a pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. It will gradually darken streaked, faded or gray hair and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.—Advt.

CHAPTER XV.

"PRAY THAT IT'S ALL RIGHT!"

. Lesard, returning that afternoon from his stay in what he called "Marchmont's dog-had an unpleasant shock.
s companion had been sent to London on busitwo days previously, and he entered his y house with a queer feeling of loneliness.
in the kitchen, which was also his sitting-nused thoughtfully. "But somehow I don't k so," and he took an amiable stroll through ouse as a man does when he comes home and s about to see how things have gone in his abe. If there had been keen eyes anywhere his nscious, dilatory progress would have seemed t natural and innocent; but he soon satisfied self that there were none; his visitor, whoever ight be, had gone.

e was stiff and hungry from his long stay in secret passage, the reason for which had es-d even Jacky Hamilton. Some unknown cause made the underground stream rise so swiftly not until midday, when the rain had ceased, it possible to cross it in any way, for the y plank staging at the inside mouth of the was completely covered by water; not even ard dared to jump to it on the chance of bewhirled off his footing.
e had no light but one candle, which he prompt-out as he lay down to sleep till the water should fall. Hungry and cross, he had passed the hours somehow, till, to his joy, the stream fell. It was chance only which had made him put out his light as Jacky watched. He had heard no sounds over the roaring of the stream, and dreamed of nothing as he set off homeward, but his dinner.

Yet now, as he cooked it, he was not easy in his mind. Some one had been prying, and it made his thoughts work. He walked round his house once more and found the road by which his visitor had entered.

"The cellar hatch! The devil! Why didn't I think of it?" but yet it reassured him. No one but Marchmont would try that way—unless the detective fool from London! Yet the last thought made him laugh. It was such wasted trouble sending police after him! He was nodding before his fire in a very luxury of warmth when something like an electric thrill ran through him.

Wide-awake in an instant, he put out his lamp with a carefully sleepy action and moved languidly into the dark hall. There his whole look changed.

Swift, noiseless, he was at his bedroom window, in the dark, listening. He was certain that the sound of a cautious footstep stealing by the house had roused him from his reverie.

He seemed to fling his senses of hearing and seeing out into the rainy dark like outposts. An ordinary man would not have discovered anything. Lesard, when he drew back from the window, knew that his house had been watched by a man, who had just taken himself off, satisfied that the tenant of Ashcroft Farm was sitting quietly at home.

"That was our friend, the detective, I'll bet," thought he curiously. "Well, my man, I think I'll give you something to cry for! Also this is no place for me. I don't want any arrests on suspicion. I wonder——" An ugly thought came over him, and he laughed, but without noise, till his eyes gleamed in the dark.

"By the Lord, I'll take my share and get out!" he observed to himself. "I'm sick of waiting on a pompous ass like Marchmont; he may fuss for a year before selling a stone—and I want money—and I won't cool my heels here if I'm watched. Not much!"

His fatigue quite gone, Mr. Lesard put some indispensable things in his pocket and started on a noiseless dog-trot for Hamilton Place.

He leaped lightly down from the embankment by his short cut, and knelt down by the entrance hole, some twenty minutes after Jacky had crept in there.

Gillian, on her knees up-stairs, might well "pray that it was all right."

Jacky Hamilton, working like a beaver, displaced the pile of stones by the light of her candle, stuck on the ground. After ten minutes' work she gave a stifled cry of joy. She was in time, they were all there! The thieves should be robbed and restitution made, and Marchmont and the others should tremble at the nod of a slip of a girl.

She took one glance at the contents of the belt. Each pocket in it was stuffed with glorious, shining things. But there was no time to look at them. She could only pray that Mrs. Fareham's diamonds were there. Gill would know; she had seen them every night but the night of the ball, when their unlucky possessor had not liked them with her peasant's dress.

For a moment Jacky was staggered by the size and weight of the belt; it would not go under her bodice as it had under Lesard's coat. She buckled it round her waist, letting it slip to her hips, and fastened her skirt over it. It was not a good place, but it must do, and luckily the belt was too tight to slide bodily to the ground. The bulk of it worried her as she looked back at the entrance, but if she could not go through with it on it would be easy to take it off again. There were more things in the hole among the stones; things in leather cases carefully bestowed; things stuck carelessly in canvas wrappings, damp and mildewed. She bent down over them, a queer figure in her black satin gown to be in that place.

The candle flame shed a feeble light on the high, vaulted roof, the slimy walls festering with growths of darkness. It gleamed faintly on the smooth swirls and eddies of the black water that was oily for all its swiftness.

The mouth of the tunnel that led upward to the wine-cellar showed like a blotch of ink. Jacky's face, white with complexion bleach, stood out like a cameo against the whirling blackness of the water behind her.

Absorbed, she leaned over the pockets. Should she take them, too? They looked like the spoils of years. The wrappings slipped off one under her fingers, and for a long minute she stared. Inside lay a necklace made of stones she had never seen.

They were clear and black, and they shone with a dreadful, many-colored fire. Somehow they were awful in that strange place at dead of night; she feared them like a living thing that was accursed. She dared not—literally dared not—have such jewels in her possession, even for a night. With noiseless haste she wrapped them up and put them back, piling the big stones over them as they had been piled before she displaced them. Time was going and she had none to spare. But she was not very quick. These strange jewels had shaken her nerve as they gleamed up into her face, evil, full of temptation. The girl felt certain they had been stolen from some wicked woman; the secret of every imaginable crime seemed to lurk in their fiery depths. She tried not to think of them as she placed the top stones carefully in their old order—and the very candle flame reflected in the black water seemed a pale image of them. By instinct she knew they were fabulously valuable, but she had no mind to meddle with such uncanny things.

"Besides," she reflected practically, "they may be Marchmont's own, and I should look well if I found they were. The other things I know about, and I'd better get off with them."

But at the very edge of the water, with one foot on the first stepping-stone, she paused with a curious feeling that some one was near her. She looked around and saw nothing; yet the terror was on her.

Suppose Marchmont were coming down to inspect his hoard; was there anywhere to hide? Or must she be caught red-handed with the belt round her waist?

Something drew her eyes to the side of the cave nearest the cellar tunnel. There was a rough natural ridge of rock sticking up close to the wall, nearly as high as a man. Suppose there was one of the gang behind it who had watched her every movement.

"I'll know if there is before I go!" she thought, with a kind of grim courage born of fear.

Candle in hand she marched over to the ridge and peered behind it, standing on her tiptoes. There was no one there.

Almost faint with relief she turned to go out by the stepping-stones again, and felt the blood leave her heart.

There was some one coming!

With a quick jerk she flung her candle from her into the depths of the stream. In the blackness she scrambled wildly over the ridge of rock and flattened herself behind it till the beating of her heart seemed to echo back from the stone.

She looked up at the roof. There was no light reflected there, not a sound but the running water, and yet she knew she had stayed too long.

She slipped her hand to the matchbox in her pocket. It was safe. If the worst came to the worst she would not die in the dark.

The irony of that thought came suddenly home to her. A glimmer of light was showing over the ridge, very faintly, but surely. If she were caught it would not be in darkness, but the light would not be of her own providing.

She clenched her hands where she lay motionless, sure it was useless to remain hidden when the light was coming from outside, and from there her own candle must have been plainly visible through those air slits in the wall that she had forgotten like an overconfident fool.

Without one hope of escape Jacky Hamilton lay watching the growing gleam.

"IT'S SO SIMPLE"

JELL-O

America's most famous dessert

THE EASY JELL-O WAY

THE making of a Jell-O dessert requires almost no explanation but a few suggestions which may aid one in obtaining even quicker, more delectable results may be of service.

Never use more water or liquid than one pint to each package of Jell-O for most successful results, and if it is desired to cool the dessert very quickly, use only half a pint of boiling liquid, stirring well until the Jell-O is dissolved, then add half a pint of iced water or iced liquid. Results may be hastened by standing the mould of Jell-O in cracked ice to chill.

If whipped cream or stiffly beaten egg white is to be added to Jell-O, chill the Jell-O until it begins to thicken, then fold in the whipped cream or egg, and place on ice.

Canned pineapple produces better results than fresh in Jell-O desserts; if the latter is used, cook it in a thin syrup until it is clear, before adding it to the Jell-O.

When ready to serve Jell-O desserts, dip the mould for a second or two in warm water, taking care that the water reaches to the top of the mould, then arrange a plate over it so that the mould is exactly in the center, and turn plate and mould together. A gentle shake will suffice to unmould the jelly.

RASPBERRY BAVARIAN CREAM

Wash one box of raspberries and sprinkle with four tablespoonfuls of sugar. Dissolve a package of Raspberry Jell-O in three-fourths pint of boiling water and when cold and still liquid whip to consistency of whipped cream. Then fold in the raspberries and juice. Set in a cold place to harden. Serve with whipped cream and garnish with fresh berries. Use canned berries when fresh are out of season.

PINEAPPLE BAVARIAN CREAM

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in half a pint of boiling water and add half a pint of juice from a can of pineapple. When cold and still liquid whip to consistency of whipped cream. Add a cup of the shredded pineapple. Pour into mould and set in a cold place to harden. Turn from mould and garnish with sliced pineapple, cherries or grapes.

CUSTARD FOR WHIPPED JELL-O

Scald one cup milk in double boiler. Beat yolks of two eggs, add three tablespoonfuls sugar, and pour on the scalded milk. Pour back into double boiler and stir until creamy. Take from the hot water, cool and flavor with one half teaspoonful vanilla.

BEAUTY SALAD

Dissolve a package of Raspberry Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and fill individual moulds or cups one-fourth full. Let harden. Coarsely chop three bananas, sprinkle with lemon juice, and add half a cup of English walnut meats coarsely chopped. Put the mixture in the moulds and pour on rest of Jell-O when it is a cold liquid. At serving time arrange on lettuce with slices of banana sprinkled with nutmeats around the turned-out Jell-O. Serve with salad dressing. This makes nine individual servings.

Winter Colds of Babies

THERE are very few babies, if any, that go through the winter without having a cold. A simple cold, while not in itself serious, if not treated may extend downward and set up a general bronchitis, or even laryngitis.

Another danger, which is a serious handicap to a child, is that a continued cold in the head leads to a catarrhal inflammation of the nose and throat that is disagreeable to bear. There are some children who are always "catching cold"; this means that they begin to sniffle and gradually a copious glairy mucous discharge makes its way from the nose. This condition lasts several days, the upper lip becoming red and sore from the discharge and the frequent wipings combined.

During all this time the baby is usually fretful, often feverish, thirsty and without much appetite. This is especially noticeable in a nursing baby for it depends on its nostrils to breathe through, while nursing, and if clogged up, nursing becomes a hard task and in some cases impossible.

Stand over the cot of a baby with a cold, you will hear it sniffling away with quickened breathing, then suddenly waking up and crying and tossing itself down on a pillow again, out of temper, it feels so uncomfortable.

These cases run their course in about three days, that is, as far as the nose is concerned, but are frequently followed by a cough, due no doubt to the extension of the cold along the mucous membrane of posterior nares and tonsils.

The causes of colds are not easy to determine; they may be caused by atmospheric borne germs, may be caused by chills, and sometimes appear to come with teething.

One important practical thing to remember is that most colds are contagious; that is, they can be given from one to another. Cold in the head, especially with eyes red and inflamed, may be ushering in measles.

In unhealthy babies, particularly scrofulous babies, any nasal catarrah may become chronic, the swollen mucous membrane become irritated or even deeply ulcerated and the secretion become pus and blood; this crusts on the surface of the mucous membrane and becomes decomposed and causes an odor.

The sense of smell is often destroyed, which is a happy thing for the afflicted child.

TREATMENT FOR COLD IN THE HEAD.—Baby must be kept in an even temperature, in one room and in bed if feverish or fretful. Give teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia, often enough to thoroughly flush bowels. A few drops of hen's oil or pinoline dropped into the nostrils is good treatment.

If baby is feverish, give, every hour, a tablet containing Tincture Aconite one-tenth minim, Tincture Belladonna three-twentieths of a minim, Tincture Bryonia, one-tenth minim. If nasal catarrh becomes chronic the following is useful: Iodoform one-half dram, Eucalyptus oil one-half ounce, vaseline three ounces, mix thoroughly and apply a little in each nostril.

Irrigating the nostrils is excellent treatment, for nasal catarrh but impracticable in very young babies. The best method is to put one-half teaspoonful each of soda and Boric Acid powder in pint of water, connect small rubber tube from bottle or jug containing lotion, insert one end up into nostril and hold up high enough to get slight pressure. It takes three people to do this, one to catch the water that flows from nose, one to hold child and one to manage the douche.

Any child with catarrh should have good food, milk, cream, good air, and internally should take two drops of Tincture Chloride of Iron, in syrup, three times a day.

After a child or baby has had a cold in the head for three or four days untreated or not treated successfully you will notice that he begins to cough; this may go on and become a bronchitis. Bronchitis is an acute catarrhal inflammation of the bronchial mucous membrane and is characterized by fever, feeling of suffocation or oppression in breathing, a dry harsh cough.

A baby that takes cold while teething is very susceptible to bronchitis, as in teething all the mucous membranes are congested, especially the bronchi.

Inhalation of dust, smoke or air too hot or too cold are irritants to the bronchi and may cause bronchitis. The treatments of bronchitis in babies are many and varied but the object in most treatments is to loosen up the mucous in the bronchi and restore as soon as possible the breathing space that is more or less filled up. The baby's strength must be kept up and if it is not possible to do this with food a few drops of brandy or whisky should be given diluted.

Local applications are useful and camphorated oil is about the best and easiest to apply. Heat up the camphorated oil in a saucer, then saturate a thin gauze in it and cover with flannel. To apply flannel properly take piece, about twice as long as it is wide, fold once each way, cut off corner, open up, cut out one side to the hole and put around neck, pinning opening with small safety-pin.

For medical treatment I put one grain of tartar emetic, and ten drops of Tincture of Ipecac in one-half glass of water and have baby take one teaspoonful every half hour. If this makes baby vomit, lessen dose and frequency.

It is always best to have bowels acting freely, and this can be done with calomel, one-fourth grain, followed by teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia.

If baby is fussy and crying, or it seems to cause pain when coughing, small doses of Dovers Powders are indicated, but must never be given except at the suggestion and under direction of a physician who is in personal touch with the case.

The subject for our talk next month will be, Dentition, or Teething.

Questions and Answers

DIPHTHERIA.—Six months ago, my one-year-old baby girl had diphtheria, and was given antitoxin, and while she has a good appetite, grows well, never feels badly, she is short of breath, wheezes and coughs a great deal. What causes this, and what will cure it?

MRS. O. P. A., Wilkinson, Miss.

A.—I think your baby has a chronic bronchitis as a result of the throat infection. Would suggest that you give her twenty-drop doses of Syrup of Hydriodic Acid (Gardner's), in water three times a day, also two-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron in syrup three times a day. Diphtheria is a serious disease and in a baby so young, great danger of complications. Get her out in the open air all you can, sleeping out of doors as much as possible.

SLEEPLESS BABY.—My two-months-old baby does not sleep well, day or night, is fussy and cries a great deal. He is big and fat, but bowels move too often and nothing seems to quiet him but paregoric.

MRS. A. S., Vontress, Texas.

A.—The most common cause of a baby crying and not sleeping is indigestion and as you mention the fact that the bowels are too active this would bear out this idea in your baby's case.

You do not say whether this is a bottle-fed baby or whether you are nursing it. If you are nursing it, get your own digestion in a normal condition and the baby's will be the same. Eat your food regularly, avoiding acid fruits and highly seasoned food that will cause gas and indigestion as the baby nurses this indigestion.

Paregoric is not good treatment, as it does not remove the cause, and I do not think I should use it.

DECAYED TEETH.—What can I do for my thirteen-months-old baby, who has eight teeth, but they seem to be breaking off, and are badly discolored? Both parents are well and have good teeth. Should I wean him?

MRS. W. E. B., Edson, Kansas.

A.—Should wean baby at once and put him on cow's milk, with lime-water, tablespoonful to each four ounces. Should give him two-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron, three times a day.

Use as mouth wash, Glycothymoline teaspoonful to tablespoonful of warm water.

UNDER WEIGHT.—I am writing to you for help in regard to my eleven-months-old, nursing baby, who is under weight, nervous, fretful, pale and constipated.

MRS. G. G., Louisburg, Ky.

A.—Wean baby at once, put her on cow's milk, two-thirds of a glass every three hours, put teaspoonful of milk of magnesia in feeding often enough to keep bowels regular. Give her oatmeal gruel that has been cooked a long time, custards, coddled eggs, molasses cookies, graham crackers. Get baby out in the open air all you can, and three times a day give her two-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron in syrup.

ANEMIA—I have a boy, seven years old, who is very pale and thin, has poor appetite and is constipated. He is very active, plays out of doors most of the time, sleeps well, but there is a jerking in his arms and legs as he sleeps.

MRS. M. B., Balaton, Minn.

A.—Should try and relieve constipation by diet, orange juice, prunes, figs and bran muffins; get him to eat oatmeal cooked a long time, stale wheat bread toasted, bacon cooked crisp, coddled eggs, and get him to drink a quart of milk a day. Regulate his play hours, so he will not get too tired, and a nap in the daytime would be good treatment. Get a bottle of Neoferrum, and give him two teaspoonfuls, three times a day.

SEBORRHEA.—I have a month-old baby who has a crust on his head that is very bad. Should I try to comb it off? MRS. H. S., Fort Slocum, Boston, Mass.

A.—This is an affection of the sebaceous glands of the scalp and this crust is an accumulation of the natural secretion.

Apply a little sweet oil at night, then gently comb off the next morning. Wash head frequently with castile soap and warm water, then apply a little weak carbolized vaseline.

ANEMIA—NIGHT SWEATS.—I have anemia and indigestion, weigh but ninety pounds. My baby is five months old and her skin seems to be cold all the time. I had night sweats before the baby came and for a few weeks afterward. What would cause them, and what ought I to do? MRS. R. M., Walhonding, Ohio.

A—The fact of your being anemic and run down would account for the night sweats, also poor circulation of baby. Take Neoferrum, dessertspoonful doses, three times a day, also Maltine with Cod-Liver Oil, in tablespoonful doses, three times a day.

NERVOUS PROSTRATION.—I have a child seven years old and have not been well since it was born, am weak, nervous, have headache, backache, and pain in both sides of abdomen. Am worse at monthly periods, have palpitation of heart, short breath, dark circles under my eyes. Tell me what to do. "MARY," Tenn.

A—I think you have a prolapsed uterus with more or less injury to cervix. Go to some competent surgeon and have an examination, and repair work done if needed. Should take, after meals and at bedtime, dessertspoonful doses of Vitolecithin (The National Drug Co., Philadelphia). Every three hours should take a tablet containing one grain each of valerianate of iron, quinine and zinc. Get out in the open air, and build up your general health with nourishing food, milk and eggs.

TWITCHING OF MUSCLES.—Could teething cause a twitching and jerking of the muscles in a twenty-months-old child who seems well and healthy in every way but this? MRS. R. T. A., E. Clarksburg, Va.

A.—Yes, and if these symptoms were continued any length of time, I should have gums lanced to relieve the congestion.

Cold cloths applied to the head is good treatment, especially if head is hot.

INDIGESTION.—What can I do for my three-months-old baby, who nurses, but vomits up its food? It is badly constipated, and is not gaining as it should. I am bothered with gas and often my stomach gets bad.

MRS. A. D. H., Cardin, Okla.

A.—Your baby has indigestion and without much doubt gets it from you. Treat the baby by getting your own digestion in a normal condition. Take teaspoonful doses of Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada often enough to keep bowels regular. Avoid acid fruits, highly seasoned foods, eat slowly and with regularity. After each meal take two-teaspoonful doses of Elix Lactated Pepsin.

STAMMERING.—Will the child born of a stammering father or mother be likely to stammer? MRS. J. C. A.

No, I think not, for in most cases, stammering is the result of some local condition like adenoids, or growth in the nose, or unduly short franum linguae. I can imagine, where both parents stammered, a child might do so from bad example, but the worst case I ever saw, neither parents or children of stammerer were affected.

NURSING BABY.—My nine-months-old baby girl wants to nurse four or five times every night, and will not go back to sleep until I nurse her. She is plump and fat, weighs eighteen pounds. What would you advise me to do? MRS. R. S. B., Newport News, Va.

A.—You have got your baby into a bad habit as she ought not to nurse during the night at all, and it will take patience and persistence to break her of the habit. It may be that your milk does not satisfy her, and you should wean her at eleven months anyway.

Her diet should consist mostly of milk, given every three hours, during day, no night feedings.

You can also give her stale wheat bread toasted, custards, coddled eggs, oatmeal gruel, molasses cookies and graham crackers.

NO ADDRESS.—If the lady who wrote from Calloway or Galloway, Nebraska, and signed herself "Norma E." will write this department again and give her full name and address she will receive an answer to her questions by mail, as the answer is of such a nature that we do not care to print it. Others, also, please take notice of the requirements stated at the heading of this department, and always give full name and address.

thing bumped into me and I sat down,—on the biggest pig we have, and rode about fifteen feet before I could stop her. She weighs about 250 pounds. I was thankful no one saw me. MISS DORIS MCCLAND.

DURHAM, 210 ALSTON AVE., N. C.

DEAR GIRLS:

I have just finished reading COMFORT and am so pleased with the letters that I decided to write one myself.

"Silver Sands," I too have a scrap-book and am sending a "sample" from it.

Sighs and Smiles

"If I could gather every sigh
That freights the breezes going by,
I'd lock them in a cell so tight
And lose the key from mortal sight.

"If in one cave all smiles were kept,
I'd like to go while their guard slept
And open the door and set them free Till all the world would smiling be."

—Epworth Era.

Will some of the sisters express their ideas about dancing, whether they think it is right or wrong. I would like to hear it discussed.

I will tell you about some parties I have attended. A very interesting way to choose partners for a game, a contest, or to go to the dining-room for refreshments is: Write as many different names of flowers (on separate slips of paper) as there are invited couples, cut the slips of paper in two pieces and put the first halves in one box and the remaining halves in another box. Pass the first box to the boys and let them take a piece of paper, and the second box to the girls. The boys then find the girl who has the other part of the name on his slip. For instance, one boy may have r-o and he finds the girl who has s-e. Another boy may have v-i-o and he has to find the girl who has l-e-t.

I'll tell you a little about myself. I am just out of my teens, weigh about 125 and am five feet, five inches tall. Have brown eyes and hair and a fair complexion.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters who have the Primary Department of their church Sunday School. That's what I do. It is fine too. I have thirteen girls in my class.

Will someone suggest something to do at a social party for little folks about seven and eight years old.

I'd like to receive letters and cards. LINA BECK.

Lina.—Don't you think it would be rather nice if all the sisters would send in their most comforting verse or thought? I do. Perhaps they will if we ask them.—Ed.

GARRISON, MD.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have read and enjoyed COMFORT for a long time but never had the courage to enter. After reading the requests of Mrs. Shinn of Pittsfield and of Mrs. Down of Columbus, I felt that I ought to come to their rescue.

I have a large ledger in which I keep clippings of games, contests, riddles and everything that I think I could use for social affairs. I wish I could pass the book around so you could select what is best suited to you. A mirth provoking game that I have played is this. Write the names of different popular and old songs on as many cards as you have guests and pin a card on the back of each person, then they can't see their own card. At a given signal, all pass around and hum a little of the tune on their friend's back. The one first guessing the name of the song on his back, wins. A record makes a suitable prize and a tiny horn a good booby prize.

Mrs. Down, a bazaar illustrative of "The Seven Ages of Woman" meets with success. There are seven tables or booths, first, the Baby Table, with everything for the wee one, second the Childhood Table with dolls, aprons; third, the Sweetheart Table, with candy and engagement souvenirs; fourth, the Bride's Table (in white) with linens and household articles; fifth comes the Mothers' Table with cakes and pies; sixth is the Spinsters' Table, with an array of bags and a family of cats might find sale, and the last is the Grandmothers' Table, with shawls, slippers and comforts.

I would like to hear from young mothers between 25 and 30 years of age, as I desire some COMFORT friends.

With best wishes to all. MRS. WM. EARL BEAM.

Mrs. Beam.—Your bazaar idea is very clever only I think a Bachelor Girl table would be more popular than a Spinster's table—or even a Flapper table for the younger set. It offers possibilities. Another letter from you, along this line, would be welcomed by the sisters, I feel sure.—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT since I was twelve years old. We live on a fruit farm here in northern Michigan and last year we had an abundant crop of cherries and plums but the market wasn't good.

I am sending a picture of my little girl, Marlene May Morrison. She is seven months old. We have a boy five years old, whose name is Wilbur Thomas. I would like to see baby's picture in COMFORT. Both of her grandmothers take COMFORT and they haven't seen her, only a picture.

I will tell you of a Christmas present I made last year. I enameled a one-pound tin coffee can in black and painted a yellow tulip on the cover, lined it with waxed paper and filled it with home-made candy.

Wishing Mrs. Wilkinson and all the COMFORT sisters a prosperous and happy year,

Yours for dear old COMFORT,
MRS. GEORGE MORRISON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL COMFORT SISTERS:

I enjoyed the letter written by MRS. LONG and would like to tell you about my club if I may. We meet Thursday afternoons and each member tries to make it as partylike as possible.

When it is my turn to entertain and serve I make up a new party from my own ideas. Once we had a Lemon party. We played Bunco and I gave six real lemons for first prize and two cakes of lemon soap for booby prize. The soap was in the shape of a lemon and smelled like one, in fact, it was when I saw this soap that the idea came to me. I served meat, potatoes, gravy, bread and butter, lemonade, lemon cake, lemon jello and lemon drops candy. For a small party lemonade and lemon cake would be sufficient. Then we had a joke, who was the lemon of the party? This is the way we found out. On one set of papers I wrote the names of those present. On another set of papers I wrote "No" on every piece with the exception of one on which I wrote "Yes." Each paper was folded and refolded many times. The names were put in one box and the No's and the one Yes in another box. Two girls drew the papers, one from each box. One read the names and the other the "no" slips until she came

Miss Pearl.—One's life work shouldn't be ... in such an eeny-meeny fashion as you propose ... it would be impossible for a stranger to ... such an important question without knowing ... about you. DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Sooner or later all good things come to us if we ... our best and one of them came to me when I received ... for COMFORT. I enjoy reading the chatty letters ... this department and turn to this corner first.

There are several things I'd like to write ... answer to different letters in this department but ... monopolize the entire corner so I'll confine myself to ... one topic.

I've noticed several members have requested suggestions for club entertainments, especially those that ... raise money. I will tell you about one our club ... on May Day. It took the form of a May-Day ... or at least we called it that, although it occurred ... the evening.

We arranged one side of the hall to represent a ... try store. This was divided into sections according ... what was to be sold. One department sold "hot ... cake and coffee, another ice cream and candy, ... other general merchandise, another carnival ... Then there was a remnant counter besides. All ... were donated, also the refreshments. All the ... taken in was clear profit. Everything save the ... cream and other refreshments, was wrapped and ... bered and no article cost more than twenty-five ... The prices ranged ten, fifteen and twenty-five ... were designated by tags of various colors; a ... marked with a red tag meant it cost twenty-five ... In each department was a cashier who had a ... taining duplicate numbered tags. The purchaser ... a number, say, "six," on a blue card, from the ... It ... great fun to open the mysterious packages ... course, all contained articles whose value was ... the price. One person got half-a-dozen fresh ... other a pound of butter, another six dahlia bulbs, ... other a fancy apron, etc., even to home-made ... washing fluid. Among the novelties were paper ... rubber balls, whistles, balloons and every noise ... obtainable. It was no time until bedlam reigned.

We chose two popular young ladies for candidates ... May Queen. Every five-cent purchase entitled the ... to one vote. One of our members kept tally of ... votes cast on a bulletin board in plain view ... contesting was hot and furious.

Each woman when she entered the hall was given a ... large, conspicuous number of a certain color ... When a gentleman purchaser drew from the ... box a tag marked "Remnant table, for men only," ... he went to the clerk of that department and ... sented his tag, was blindfolded and allowed to ... a number from the "Remnant table." This number ... responded to one worn by some woman in the hall ... sought her and was compelled to buy her an ice ... cone. One popular young lady declared she ate ... cones that night.

In each department there were special prize ... ages whose contents were displayed; for instance, ... the candy section was a large box of the best candy. ... The one who drew the lucky number got this box ... free.

A Dollar will put Yourself in Her Place

MOST women find a lot of fun in window shopping and looking at beautiful styles in catalogs and magazines. But for most of us such fun usually ends in heartaches, and even bitterness, because it seems so far beyond our reach.

No matter who you are or where you live; no matter what your circumstances may be or how little or how much you spend on clothes, I think I can make it all a little pleasanter, easier and more satisfactory in the future. Whatever dreams of stylish clothes you may have, here is an opportunity to make your dream come true. However much you have ever admired some woman of your acquaintance for the clothes she wears, here is an opportunity for you without trouble or bother or extra expense to put yourself in her place.

It seems more like a fairy tale than anything else you can imagine. It may seem almost too good to be true. But I have been doing this for years. Hundreds of thousands of women all over America return to me season after season for all their clothes needs. I never go back on a promise. I guarantee every statement I make.

One Example Among Thousands

On this page I show you a perfectly lovely little model in one of the season's newest fashions, exquisitely tailored in all-wool Poiret Twill. It is a gem of a style. And as you examine it on the fashion figure, you may wonder how you would look in her place. I'd love to actually put you in her place without promise or obligation, without expense or risk of any sort to you.

It would give me no end of pleasure to send you this charming dress to try on, to examine and compare just as much as you please. My bargains are my pride. I am especially proud of this value. The matter of style has always been second nature to me, and I am glad to submit this model as an example of the thousands shown in my latest and most beautiful style book.

Pin a Dollar to the Coupon

For just one dollar with your request, I will send you this dress, postage prepaid, in your proper size, to examine as carefully as you please, to try on to your heart's content. The dollar that you send me brings the dress delivered to your home without one further penny's outlay, without the bother of any C. O. D., without even a thought of money until you decide you want it and to keep it.

Take All Spring and Summer to Pay

If you find you would rather return it, do so without question. I'll refund your dollar at once. I'll also pay the return express. Money is the last thing you really need to worry about, because if you are delighted, you can pay the balance of my bargain price almost as you please. I want you to spread the cost over all this Spring and Summer, taking a full six months, paying little by little in small sums, evenly divided, coming a month apart.

My whole business is conducted in exactly the same manner as this one example.

Church Affiliations of Our Presidents

By Carl Shurz Lowden

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CONSIDER the Presidents. Most, not all, were church members; and of the denominations one leads all the rest as a contributor of Presidents.

But the contest of the sects is not as close as that of the states. For the proud title, "Mother of Presidents," Virginia and Ohio vie with each other; but Virginia has sent eight sons to the White House, and Ohio only seven. Now change the latter number to six, and you will have the score between the two leading denominations among those wishing to be "Church Mother of Presidents."

In the early days the Episcopalians had the Unitarians as a formidable rival; now their chief competitor is the Presbyterians. The truly imposing Episcopalian list consists of Washington, Madison, Monroe, Harrison (William Henry), Tyler, Taylor, Pierce, and Arthur. Since the administration of Arthur the Episcopalians have failed to add any names to their roll.

JOHN ADAMS.

Those adherents which may be considered as up and coming strong, are the Presbyterians. They started a bit late with Andrew Jackson; then came, in order, Buchanan, Lincoln, Cleveland, Harrison (Benjamin), and Mr. Wilson. The Unitarians now occupy fourth position with four of their representatives, namely, John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Fillmore, and Mr. Taft.

Five of our Presidents, Polk, Johnson, Grant, Hayes and McKinley, allied themselves with the Methodist faith. Out of the long list just two, Van Buren and Roosevelt, were members of the Reformed Dutch church; and Garfield, was the only Disciple that obtained a lease on the White House.

When the curtain dropped upon the inaugural of the fourth of March, 1921, something happened that has never happened hitherto. The Baptists have long been hoping that one of their number would ascend to the nation's highest office; and that hope was translated into reality when Chief Justice White administered the oath to the kindly gray-haired man from Marion, Ohio.

What type of a Baptist is President Warren G. Harding? Well, he reads that good old textbook, the Bible. Though strong in the faith, he does not claim for himself such spirituality as was his mother's. He has carried through life the lasting impress of her religious teaching.

ABIGAIL ADAMS, WIFE OF JOHN ADAMS.

"My mother," he has said, "brought us children up to know and revere the word of God. To me the Bible has ever been the Book of Books. Nowhere in the English language can such beauty be as is found in the Psalms."

As a Baptist President he is distinctly a newcomer, and the exception. As a Christian President he is the twenty-eighth of the memorable roll, and the rule.

I say twenty-eighth advisedly; for Jefferson is usually considered a free-thinker or liberal, and his religious convictions are sometimes doubted. Jefferson did not mince words when he spoke. He did not always guard himself against being misunderstood. He contended for the separation of church and government, and for the opportunity of the individual to worship as he should wish. There is, I am sure, no crime in either of these activities.

"I proposed," he wrote in 1800 in retrospect at the age of fifty-seven, "the demolition of the church establishment and the freedom of religion. It could only be done by degrees. The act of 1776, chapter 2, exempted dissenters from contributions to the church, and left the church clergy to be supported by voluntary contributions of their own sect; it was continued from year to year and made perpetual in 1779, chapter 36. I prepared the act for religious freedom in 1777 as part of the revisal which was not reported to the Assembly till 1779; that particular law was not passed till 1785, and then by the efforts of Mr. James Madison." He was describing his activities in behalf of the movement for the separation of Church and State in Virginia.

Now compare the foregoing with Jefferson's wise counsel to one of his grandsons. The octogenarian with little more than a year and four months between him and the grave, wrote a three-part letter to be read after his death. The first section, a long paragraph of prose, was followed by "The Portrait of a Good Man by the most Sublime of Poets," and "A Decalogue of Canons for Observation in Practical Life." I can quote only the latter half of the prose.

"Adore God," the venerable author of the Declaration of Independence urged upon the youth. "Reverence and cherish your parents. Love your neighbor as yourself, and your country more than yourself. Be just. Be true. Murmur not at the ways of Providence. So shall the life into which you have entered be the portal to one of eternal and ineffable bliss. And if to the dead it is permitted to care for the things of this world, every action of your life will surely be under my regard. Farewell."

Plainly these are not the words of an unbeliever, for irreligious persons do not write in that style upon such occasions. Jefferson today bears the label of "Liberal" merely because he never indicated, at any time in his life, his denominational preference.

If from the presidential roll any one name might be selected as that of a man who did not live in accordance with Christian rules of conduct, it is that of Andrew Jackson. He could do a more realistic bit of swearing than any of his soldiers, and none possessed a hotter temper. He was both unlettered and uncultured, rough and rude. Furthermore, he was obstinate as a mule.

Yet almost over night "Old Hickory" changed his ways. Devotedly he loved his wife; and when she died he emerged from the ordeal of the great loss minus his profanity and his coarseness. From that time until his own final breath he used a portion of each evening to thumb through her prayer-book and to read the passages she had marked.

Back at his old home, "The Hermitage," near Nashville, Tennessee, the aged man embraced the opportunity to hear the stirring sermons of an evangelist or revivalist. He was deeply impressed, so deeply that on a certain morning he solemnly informed his family and friends that he desired to become a Presbyterian. He was admitted and soon made an elder; but he doubted his own ability and therefore did not serve in that capacity. From that date, however, "The Hermitage" was a place of daily worship for the white-haired old warrior and his kindred.

If there was ever a President whose religious convictions could not be denied, that man was Abraham Lincoln. He educated himself by reading the Bible, the works of Shakespeare, and those of Euclid; yet at the age of twenty-five he wrote a long essay in which he flouted Christianity. It would have been published if a friend had not intervened and thrown the manuscript into a stove. The friend perceived that Lincoln was still in a formative stage and had not found himself; he also foresaw that the production, if circulated, would snuff out the budding political career. This act alone saved to the world one of its greatest men.

The religious feeling of "Honest Abe" grew and flowered under stress and in trouble. The history of the Civil War reveals him constantly as a benign, kindly man with a firm faith in God. His remarks to his cabinet, his letters and his speeches are replete with many references to Providence.

"Let us not be over-sanguine of a speedy triumph," runs a letter which he penned in the autumn of 1863. "Let us be quite sober. Let us diligently apply the means, never doubting that a just God, in his own good time, will give us the rightful result."

In the spring of 1864 he wrote to A. G. Hodges on the subject of emancipation, and of slavery. He closed his missive with this statement: "If God now wills the removal of a great wrong and wills also that we of the North, as well as you of the South, shall pay fairly for our complicity in that wrong, impartial history will find therein new cause to attest and to revere the justice and the goodness of God."

At his second inaugural in March, 1865, he returned to the same vein of thought as that expressed in the foregoing message to A. G. Hodges. With the scourge of war as his theme he asserted in the true style of the master that he undoubtedly was:

"Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, 'The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'"

And what did he say to Mrs. Bixby, she who had lost five sons on the field of battle? "I pray," he told her from the depths of his own heart, "that our heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement."

Lincoln was filled with religious feeling from the time he first thought of issuing the Emancipation Proclamation to the time when he did issue it. When the Confederate army was at Frederick early in September, 1862, he determined his course and decided to act as soon as it should be driven out of Maryland. "I said nothing to any one," he informed his cabinet shortly afterward, "but I made the promise to myself and to my Maker."

On the twenty-second day of this same September the President ushered in a meeting of the cabinet by reading a bit of humor from a book by Artemus Ward. In the entire group of leaders, the face of only one, Stanton, remained immobile. After the smiles and laughter had subsided the "Railsplitter" jumped from the ridiculous to the sublime.

"The rebel army is out of Maryland," he declared in a tone of resolution. "I am going to fulfill the promise I made to myself and God. So I have got you together to hear what I have written down."

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

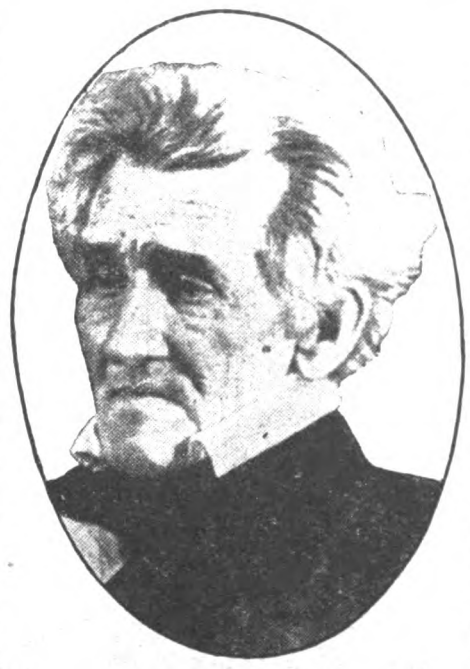
Next day the announcement of the forthcoming edict was sent forth. That evening the President was serenaded and asked to speak. He complied. With a few well-chosen words he averred he had taken the step after a very full deliberation and under a very heavy and solemn sense of responsibility; then he humbly told his unexpected callers, "I can only trust in God I have made no mistake."

That other towering American, George Washington, also relied "confidently on that Providence which has heretofore preserved and been bountiful to me." As a youth he wrote out hundreds of maxims of good behavior and studied them in this formative period until they became the groundwork, the foundation stones, of his career. "The Father of his country" feared God, believed in Christ, worshiped in public and private, and acknowledged divine aid in everything that he accomplished.

His successor, John Adams, was fiery, erratic, and opinionated. When he was inaugurated his wife besought God to "Give unto him an understanding heart that he may know how to go out and come in before this great people, that he may discern between good and bad." She provided the larger part of the family's religious life; and he followed her example rather lamely.

When he was a boy his parents educated him for the ministry. The twig, however, would not bend as the old bough wished. It persisted in growing in its own way, away from the ministry and toward the law.

"Where," John asked in a dramatic outburst against dogmatic Christianity, "do we find a precept in the gospel requiring ecclesiastical synods, convocations, councils, decrees, creeds, confessions, oaths, subscriptons, and whole cartloads of other trumpery that we find religion encumbered with in these days?"



In this conflict, this crisis, between the hope of his parents and his own inclination the son acted a noble part; for he preserved his respect and also his sincerity. He knew that in a pulpit he would be a misfit, a square peg in a round hole, and certainly never himself. He felt too much resentment for the intolerance and dogmatism that too often obscures, or at least makes difficult, the distinction between true and pseudo Christianity.

James Knox Polk was not a Presbyterian though his name has usually been associated with this sect. His wife was a member in good standing, and during his administration he often accompanied her to church. This courtesy gave rise to the common error. Shortly before Polk died he requested the presence of Rev. J. B. McFerrin, a Methodist pastor in Nashville, Tennessee. When the friend arrived the sick man asked to be received into the Methodist ranks, and the ceremony was then performed.

Through the four years at Washington the Vice President with Polk had ample opportunity to observe and learn his character. This man, George M. Dallas, called him "temperate, industrious, accessible, punctual but also patient, moral without austerity, and devotional though not bigoted." Polk's political enemies, it must be said, were somewhat less charitable toward him.

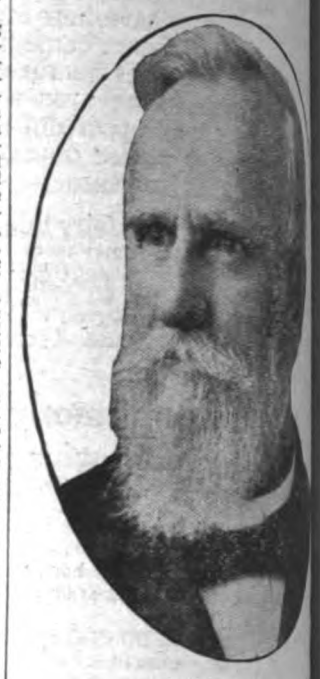
At his home in Concord, New Hampshire, Franklin Pierce attended with marked regularity the South Congregational church though he never held any membership therein. In the city of Washington, however, President Pierce quickly transferred his allegiance to the Episcopal denomination and attended the services of that church, but he was never a communicant.

The old Foundry Methodist church which once occupied a corner of Fourteenth and G streets in Washington, was the favored place of worship for Rutherford B. Hayes and his family. A commentator of that time said that they stood for their religious life hard and fast, and he also described them as "actually living their religion day by day all through the week as well as on Sunday." This conviction or impression was heightened by Mrs. Hayes's action in banishing all alcoholic beverages from the White House; this, in turn, caused an increase in the number of delegations of reformers that solicited attention and aid.

ANDREW JACKSON.

As an orator James A. Garfield held a conspicuous position. James G. Blaine attributed the earnestness of his style to his familiarity with the Bible and its literature of which he was a constant student. As principal of Hiram College he participated in the prayer-meetings and preached almost every Sunday. In the neighboring towns he also delivered literary lectures, and public addresses on special occasions.

Young Garfield had a thrilling time after he begged his mother for permission to go to sea and she had compromised by agreeing to the substitution of a life on the river wave for "a life on the ocean wave"—if I may quote the title and principal phrase of the old song. He became a canal boy, and later a member of the crew. He fell in the river fourteen times, the fourteenth episode occurring when he attempted to uncoil a rope in the process of steadying the boat through a lock. The rope flipped him off the deck, but he managed to grasp and thus to haul himself aboard.



"What saved me that time?" he asked himself as the water trickled from his garments. "God surely does many miraculous things. Was it my mother's prayers? She could never forget me."

The poet Wordsworth said that the child is the father of the man. Garfield's conduct at home, on the battlefield, and throughout his [illegible] reer, certainly demonstrated the truth of the aphorism.

A man without a church Roosevelt [illegible] have been in Oyster Bay, the Long Island [illegible] in which he had established his home. [illegible] that Oyster Bay had no Reformed Dutch [illegible] did not worry "T. R." He merely transferred his religious devotion to another sect, the Presbyterians, to whom he was a tower of strength.

"I wonder," the second of the Roosevelt Presidents once remarked to a friend, "why they call one verse of Micah that I am very fond of, 'to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God'—that to me is the whole religion. To be just with all men, to be merciful to those to whom mercy should be shown, to realize that there are some things which must remain a mystery, and when the time comes for us to enter the great beyond, to go serenely unafraid—that is my religion and my [illegible]."

"The Rough Rider" never could [illegible] policy of keeping one's light hid beneath a bushel; he had an evident tendency toward the [illegible] lar in his religious life. When a newspaper respondent touched upon this point and [illegible] that he himself could worship as reverently [illegible] a cigar and a book under a tree as he [illegible] side a church, Roosevelt agreed [illegible] wisdom of such a course.

"Doubtless you can, my friend," he [illegible] tically commented, "but no one would [illegible] pect you of it."

Both Benjamin and Mrs. Harrison [illegible] terians. In Washington they attended [illegible] of the Covenant in simple style and [illegible] tentation. Colonel William H. Crook, [illegible] to the President, said that the distinguished [illegible] did not show such positive interest [illegible] matters as Rutherford and Mrs. Hayes [illegible] played; yet he considered them "deeply [illegible] in all that good works could accomplish."

Truly typical of life was the statement [illegible] guard. The Harrisons exhibited a milder [illegible] ment than had previous residents of the [illegible] House. Perhaps they did not make [illegible] innermost thoughts. Perhaps they, like [illegible] paper correspondent that interviewed them, [illegible] able "Teddy," were more private than [illegible] their worship.

The truly great and wise in all lands and [illegible] ages have been religious minded, for it is [illegible] warped and narrow minds that deny God. [illegible] is true now as it was in the time of King [illegible] when the great Psalmist wrote: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

LUCY WEBB HAYES, [illegible] PRESIDENT HES

And so it appears from a careful study of the lives and sayings of our Presidents, as preserved in history or handed down by tradition, that in heart they revered God, even those least demonstrative of religious belief trusting the Supreme Ruler for help and guidance, while most of them have been professed Christians and church members setting an admirable example by their regular attendance at divine worship.

As would be expected of broad-minded men, they have not been bigoted but tolerant and respectful of religious beliefs that differed from theirs, as instanced by the incident heretofore narrated concerning President Roosevelt's attendance at a church other than that of his preference.

Of like liberal tendency was the example set by Washington, who, though a member of the Episcopal church, when detained over Sunday in a town having only a Presbyterian church would attended service at that church but participate in the Communion rites.

Note.—Doubtless all, except the youngest readers, will recognize the front cover portraits of Washington, Lincoln, Garfield and Roosevelt as well as the picture of Mr. and Mrs. Hayes coming out of church.—Editor RICHLY endowed with the goods of this world, as well as in friends and a devoted family, no one doubts that the illustrious Father of his Country, had fully as much attention paid to the observance of his birthdays, in the bosom s family, as the most exacting could desire. t is a noteworthy fact, that it was not by ed soldiers, nor by admiring citizens that lay was first given the distinction of a pub- elebration, but by French officers and men med at Newport, Rhode Island.

all history there is no prettier story than which is found in the record of the little onial and the stately dignity and fautless esy with which it was proffered and received ese two great figures which stand out linked ner in bravery and gallantry through many e stirring hours of the Revolution.

e intrepid fighter, Comte de Rochambeau, the ch Marshal whom America now delights to , was the instigator of this bit of friendly ge to the war-harassed Washington then usly waiting at Windsor for a favorite op- nity to engage the enemy.

ough the French Count had been in America few months, having been sent over by his nment in 1780 with a force of 6,000 men to the colonies in the struggle for liberty, he conceived a warm friendship for General ington of which he gave abundant proof, not then but upon many a later occasion.

the old Calendar system was then in use, ington's birthday fell upon February 11th at time, but from about 1790 (ten years) February 22nd was the day observed.

neral Washington was always most modest rning himself, and therefore the Count's let- nforming him of the attention given to the f his birth must have been quite gratifying. s dated February 12, 1781, and among other s the Count says:

esterday (Sunday) was the anniversary of Excellency's birthday. We have put off cele- ng that holiday until today, by reason of the 's Day, and we will celebrate it with the sole t that your Excellency be not a witness of ffusion and gladness of our hearts."

e reply to this cordial epistle, dated Febru- 27th, was written with the dignity and for- y that characterized all of the great Gener- correspondence and reads:

he flattering distinction paid to the anniver- of my birthday is an honor for which I dare ttempt to express my gratitude. I confide in Excellency's sensibilities to interpret my ngs for this, and for the obliging manner in h you are pleased to announce it."

e following October brought the surrender of town, the decisive victory of the Revolution. , with the advent of peace and the following aceful pursuits, the people had more time to k of celebrations, so that the Fourth of July Washington's Birthday were jointly given the est honors. February 22nd came to take the e, in the hearts of the people, that once had given to the observance of the natal day of English Kings, but which had only been given most perfunctory attention in America for a time prior to the outbreak of the war, except he Tories who adhered to the King with the e reverence that had always been their cus-hen the royal holiday lapsed into total netude on the conclusion of hostilities and erican victory, the birthday of the great erican leader took its place as a national cele- ion.

ew York at once began to prepare for a popu- demonstration for February 22, 1784, which less than three months after the departure the British army from our shores. While rge part of the city was still in ruins and s as the result of the fire of 1776, the devasta- and misfortunes in the wake of the war were aside and the population of the city threw lf wholeheartedly into a jubilation. Church s were taxed to their utmost limit of effort inging out joyful peals and everywhere flags bunting were flung to the breezes. From the fort on the Battery, salutes were fired at fre- nt intervals. In the evening an entertainment given on board an East Indian ship in the bor and an old paper of that date describes assemblage of guests as "a very brilliant and pectable company." Thirteen cannon were fired all of the exercises of the day were described being held with "that hilarity and manly de- um ever attendant upon the Sons of Freedom." hirteen was far from being considered an ucky number in the days of the country's in- cy. Thirteen guns were always fired as a tional salute in honor of the thirteen states d the same number of toasts were the order all of the banquets and feasts. But the cus- n of drinking a separate and liberal toast to h state was of a necessity abandoned after the tes began to come into the union so rapidly, of simple consideration for the limited ca- city of the diners and drinkers.

Soon the celebrations began to assume a politi- aspect, and great rivalry grew up between tions as to who should outdo the other in dis- y of decoration, brave speeches and show of triotism.

Among the notable early celebrations of this nt was that of Tammany Hall in 1790, when s association, then called the Society of St. mmany, was but a year old in organization. that time Washington was President and was lding in New York, then the nation's capital. ter adopting a resolution that the society should ways observe February 22nd, the Tammanyites cided to fully use this opportunity to do nor and homage to Washington, which they did ost royally in speeches and toasts, songs and a rade.

The same year was marked with observance of e birthday of the Father of His Country by a rge number of towns and cities throughout the nd which wished thus to establish a record for noring the new President, and for weeks after- ard the papers were filled with accounts of the rious celebrations.

In 1792, Washington attended the ball given in s honor by the New Dancing Assembly which ld forth in Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. For is Mrs. Washington also donned her best bib d tucker and accompanied him. Other guests distinction who participated in the festivities the evening were Vice President John Adams d the French Minister and other prominent of- cials.

The ladies attending added largely to the en- yment of the event by the unique manner of isplaying various popular public sentiments. hese were wrought in gold letters and arranged their head-dresses. Later a banquet was served which the President and Lady Washington re- ained, but when half the toasts were drunk, he rose and drank a toast to the health of the com- pany and departed with his wife leaving the rest of the company to make merry as long as they liked. This was in accord with his habit of retiring early.

One of the toasts of this evening was as follows:

"The daughters of Columbia, may their virtues insure respect, their charms awaken love and Hymen crown them with domestic bliss."

In 1798 New York observed the 65th birthday with appropriate ceremonies. Beginning at ten o'clock a salute of cannon was fired and in the evening nearly five hundred people, men and women attended a grand ball and supper at the Tontine Assembly Rooms on Broadway. Here Washington's full length portrait was displayed.

Harvard college is on record as having also given to this day a most enthusiastic celebration. One of their toasts which is worthy of note as they evinced a consideration for the comfort of the public at large by cheering in pantomime, reads:

George Washington, a man brave without temerity, laborious without ambition, generous without prodigality, noble without pride, virtuous without secrecy. Three cheers in pantomime for fear of disturbing the peace."

In 1799 the last birthday during the lifetime of the beloved general was celebrated with customary joyous festivities, but never in the history of the nation has there been such a day of mourning as marked February 22nd, 1800. This was a day of grief and sorrow all over the land.

The President issued a proclamation in accordance with the resolution of congress, "that it be recommended to the people of the United States to assemble on the twenty-second day of February, next in such numbers and manner as may be convenient, publicly to testify to their grief for the death of General George Washington, by suitable eulogies, orations and discourses and that the President be requested to issue proclamation for the purpose of carrying the foregoing resolution into effect.

The New York State Society of Cincinnati marched in a body to the New Dutch Church, and the clergy, mayor and all prominent officials attended. The people were overwhelmed with grief and all were in tears. Reverend Mr. Simms delivered an oration that moved all hearers to tears and the papers of the day in their accounts called it a message from the tomb of Washington.

When all the packages had been sold and the balloting completed, the May Queen was crowned and the children gave a short May-Day program. The evening wound up with dancing.

Our club gives a number of social events during the year and I am always glad to know new suggestions.

Sincerely, J. E. S.

GAINES, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have often wanted to write to this corner but fear of the waste-basket has kept me silent.

Mrs. R. V. Long wrote an interesting letter. Here is an idea for a party that you may like, it is called a Backward Party. Guests come dressed backward, hair combed backward, coats, collars, waists skirts, etc., on backward. Go backward up the back stairs into the back door. Converse back to back, greet your friends with good by and leave them with How do you do? Sing "Good Night, Ladies" the first thing. Serve the dessert first and the heartier part of the supper last. Put lettuce leaves on top of salad, pass napkins after food is served, etc. For anyone who violates the rules here are a few suggestions for forfeits. Sing a lullaby to a sofa cushion, give your opinion of the League of Nations, act what the doctor did the last time he came to see you, show how you look and act when you are trying to flirt.

Here is another game that is interesting for young people. Any number of couples may play. Each man has a partner and they stand in two double lines. Each girl has a plate on which are twenty-five raisins and a toothpick. At a given signal the girls who head the lines begin to feed their partners the raisins, using the toothpicks for spearing the raisins and feeding each one separately. As soon as either couple finishes they must sing one verse and chorus of some popular song and at the end of the song the next couples begin. The line that finishes first wins.

I am five feet, four inches tall, weigh 140 pounds, have dark hair and eyes and my nose turns straight up. Married? No, and I'm very happy.

I live in the Panhandle State and like it very much.

A COMFORT Sister, C.

TERRE HAUTE, 929 So. 19TH ST., IND.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

I've been a constant reader and lover of COMFORT for a long time and simply devour every word of it, particularly the sisters' letters. I have received many helpful suggestions and hints from the letters but never yet have seen one from a sister who belonged to a "Parent and Teacher Association," or talked of it. In Terre Haute we have thirty-four associations. A Parent and Teacher Association or Club is a club made up of the teachers of a certain school and all of the patrons, organized, to better conditions for the child by their cooperation. It seems to me that no club can create a better feeling of fellowship and a better community spirit than can the P. T. A's.

The meetings should be held in the schoolhouse; there the conditions which daily surround the child may be seen and remedied if necessary. Then too, when parents meet their children's teachers and become acquainted with them and learn to know and like them, the child will take pride and interest in his school. He will do better work.

A P. T. A. will awaken a neighborhood and make everyone interested in the school and community.

Our clubs, in Terre Haute, have done wonders. Many insanitary conditions which daily surrounded the children, were remedied; noonday lunches for under-nourished children were made possible; playground equipment has been installed; medical clinics were held at the schools with surprising results. It would be almost impossible to tell all the good we have done.

All our school associations are organized under one big form, called a Council which meets once a month, as should each individual club. Then we have a round table talk which is for the good of the child. At present I am acting president of the Mont Rose Parent and Teacher Association and vice-president of our Council. There is a great deal of work to it but a greater amount of good is being done.

As to the social side of it, we all have jolly times, with lunches, entertainments and sometimes get acquainted with our next door neighbors. You know, in large cities, it is a rare thing to know your neighbors.

I have one boy, twelve years old. He is interested in the P. T. A. and likes to have me visit his school.

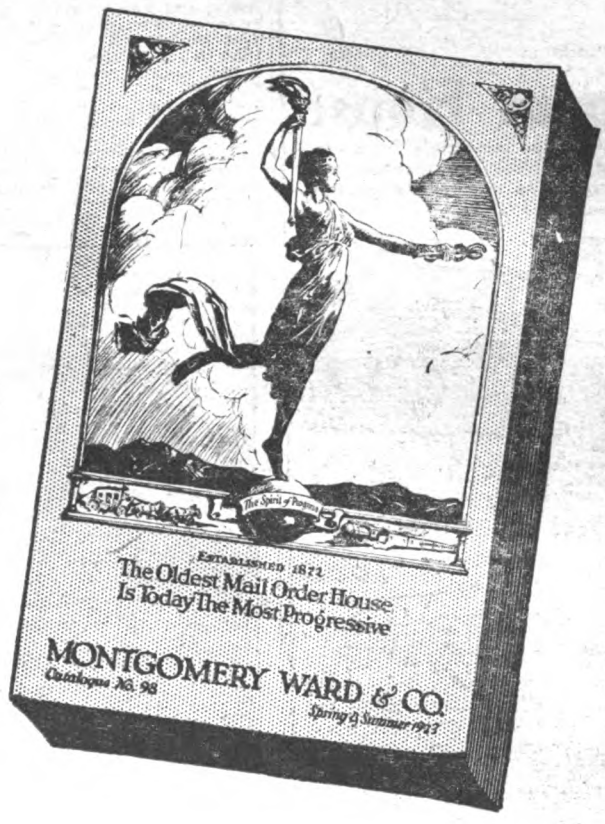
I think it would be a good thing for each sister who does not have a P. T. A. in her school to get busy and organize one. You will be surprised at the help you will get.

Good by for this time.

MRS. LOUISE NEWLAN DENEHIE.

PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR FOLKS.



I couldn't help but sound my trumpet when I read the letter from Jeff, Malvern, Iowa. She asks about raising one child alone, and I want to say to her "Don't" with a capital D, and don't forget to underscore it. There are many reasons for not doing it. You want your child to be like other people, but if she is raised alone, I am afraid such will not be the case. Think over the people of your acquaintance and see if there isn't an almost indescribable "something" about the ones that were raised by themselves that brand them differently from the ones that were in larger families. In almost every instance they are more selfish, thoughtless and self-willed. This is because they have never had to give up anything and things usually go the way they want them. And then the lonesomeness—the many hours they have to spend alone, for Mother has other things to do besides play. Few people realize just how lonely a child can be. I am an only child and have a good home, but that has never quite made up for my loss of companionship. I have many friends, but still there is a difference. You may give your child every advantage, but it will not quite take the place of companionship.

There have been some wonderful letters written in reply to "Worried Mother," but I think one of the best came from "One of That Sort." She certainly painted the picture true to life. I would not marry "Worried Mother's" son or any other mother's son under those conditions. And if that girl does, I am afraid she will regret it. You know it was all her fault; the boy was perfect gentleman and all that. If he does marry her, it is not at all likely that he will be good to her. Such is quite often the case. If I were that girl, I would

The "President's Cottage"

By Louise Gunton Royston

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THIS historic little house is the oldest building on the grounds of the U. S. Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C. It was originally a farmhouse and was sold with the 500 acres of land later comprising the grounds of the U. S. Soldiers' Home, which Gen. Winfield Scott founded in 1851. The house was used as a dormitory by the first soldier inmates of the Home, and was later used as a summer residence by several Presidents of the United States. President Buchannan occupied it in the summers of 1856 to 1860; President Lincoln in 1861 to 1864, a few months previous to his assassination on April 14, 1865; President Hayes in 1877 to 1880, and President Arthur in 1881 to 1884. President Garfield was making all preparations to occupy the house for the summer of 1881, when he was brutally assassinated on July 2, 1881.

President Lincoln was occupying the house in the summer of 1864, during the siege of Washington, when an army of 20,000 men under Gen. Early was sent to capture the city but was routed by Gen. Sheridan. The house is further associated with President Lincoln, for it was here under its roof that he spent many of the soul-trying days of his administration, working with untiring patience for the preservation of the Union. In the upper corner room with the two windows under the big gray gable, at the left end of the building, is where he wrote his famous "Emancipation Proclamation," by which over 10,000,000 negroes in the United States are now free men. A letter written to Horace Greely from here contains many thoughts on this great problem. Among other things he said:

"If there be those who would not save the Union unless at the same time save slavery, I don't agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless at the same time they could destroy slavery, I don't agree with them. My paramount object is to save the Union. If I could save the Union by freeing all the slaves, I would do it. If I could free some and leave others alone, and thus save the Union, I would do that. What I do regarding slavery, I do because I believe it will help save the Union, and what I forbear, I forbear because I think it will help save the Union. I will do less whenever I feel what I am doing hurts the cause, I will do more whenever I feel doing more will help the cause."

The house was known as the "President's Cottage" and the "Mansion House" until 1888, when it was given the name of "Anderson Cottage," in honor of Brig. Gen. Robert Anderson of Fort Sumter fame, in appreciation of his interest and efforts in behalf of the soldiers and in the establishment of the U. S. Soldiers' Home, and also on account of his general brilliant record as a soldier. Fort Sumter was associated with both the beginning and the end of the Civil War, and was bravely defended by General (then Major) Anderson against an attack on the national flag by overwhelming Confederate forces under General Beauregard, April 12, 1861, which was the event which marked the beginning of the Civil War. The fort remained in possession of the Confederates until the capture of Charleston compelled its surrender and the United States flag was again raised over Fort Sumter on April 14, 1865, by General Anderson.

The handsome old stove which still does service is built in the wall of the kitchen of the house. The portion of the building at the extreme right end under the small gable is the kitchen. It was undoubtedly used by Mrs. Lincoln and servants, and by the wives and servants of the other Presidents during the years they spent in the house. Indeed, it would not be hard to imagine that President Lincoln himself may have done a little cooking on it at times during those troublous days.

This historic house is now again used as a dormitory for some of the Civil War veterans. It is surrounded by miles and miles of beautiful scenery, and overlooks the city of Washington from a high elevation, the nation's Capitol and Washington's Monument plainly looming up in the distance three miles away.

The garden house, used by President Lincoln and others, is situated a few yards to the right of the "President's Cottage." It was built about 1858 from the trunks of red cedar wood and wild grape-vine branches. The artistic, curling twigs of the grape-vine branches give a beautiful lacy effect. Its shady recesses now afford a favorite retreat for soldiers living in the Home. At the left of this garden house you can catch a glimpse of the clock tower on Scott Building, from which President Lincoln and Mrs. Lincoln watched the advancing army coming up from the valley to attack Washington during the summer of 1864.

When General Winfield Scott founded the U. S. Soldiers' Home in 1851, he said to the soldiers: "Boys, we are going to have a home on these beautiful grounds, but there can be no home without a chapel." Consequently the little chapel was built in 1851 at the time the Home was founded. President Lincoln and other illustrious residents of the Home have from time to time worshiped here. The little chapel is built of Seneca stone, and is almost entirely surrounded by beautiful, shady trees. Protestant and Catholic services are both held here, one in the morning and the other in the afternoon. The little monument at the right of the chapel was erected by the enlisted men of the army of the Civil War in memory of Henry Wilson, who did a great deal for the soldiers. There is an inscription on one side of the monument which reads: "The Soldiers' Friend."

Henry Wilson was born Feb. 16, 1812. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1855, serving three terms. He became an abolitionist in 1835, and during his career in the Senate was a fearless opponent of slavery, and was a close friend of Charles Sumner. He was elected Vice President of the United States in 1872, on the ticket with General Grant. He died in Washington, D. C., Nov. 22, 1875, while still Vice President.

Ruth, you do sling the verbal pepper-cruet, I'll say! Gus, the Talcum Teaser, and Jack, the Girl Groucher, will be sure to sit up and squirm a bit when they read your snappy paragraphs. As for Jack, he will probably avoid Minnesota for the rest of his unmated life—fearing that you might get him in that dark corner for five minutes and force him to recant. And, Gus, if he agrees to take any lessons from you in enjoying girls' company, will be sure to insist, for the sake of "safety first," that the course be given by mail. After having built up this girl-despising reputation, Ruth, you may be sure that Gus and Jack, the Talcum Twins, are not going to have it all destroyed by you and your feminine wiles.

I may be an old-fashioned Uncle, Ruth but I do not like bobbed hair. It is not beautiful. If "blessed freedom" is all that is craved, why not shave your locks entirely off? Even fingers would be unnecessary as combs then! Through the ages a woman's hair has been a glory and crown to her. The uniformity of bobbed hair the lack of framing it to the face, the more or less masculine suggestion—these are all valid objections to the ugly custom, I believe. Let's hear what other bobbed or unbobbed cousins say about it.

But as you think Jack is, Ruth, I am pretty sure you, too, are "sot." If you want to powder your nose and bob your hair, you'll keep right on bobbing and powdering no matter what your old bald-headed, shiny-nosed Uncle thinks about these things. Anyway, I'll wager you've got unclipped brains under that bobbed hair and behind that talcumed little nose piece. Most men are "skeered" of brains in a girl, Ruth. Have you noticed this in the course of your wise Minnesota musings?

ARMSTRONG, MISSOURI.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I'm a little girl eleven years old. I have blue eyes and brown hair. I have five brothers; the youngest is five months old. He can laugh and coo. We have a pet cat—his name is Tom. Once we found him catching chickens, so we are going to carry him away. I have some other pets: there are some rabbits and a dog.

Your niece, EMMA JANE.

Emma Jane, of all your five brothers I'm sure I would like the youngest the best. For he can "laugh and coo." There never was a more charming accomplishment nor one of more real importance to the welfare of mankind. We should all be careful to laugh and coo as early as possible in life and keep up the happy process so long as breath will allow. Why just think if the Kaiser, who may be supposed to have cooed once upon a time in his Potsdam cradle, had just kept on with the joyous gurgling through later life, how could he have gone roaring through Belgium? Or just suppose that all Europe today was a-laughing and a-cooing instead of making ugly faces and noises—why what a different world we might have! It would even affect the price of exchange if international bankers took a laughing and cooing course. Yes, Emma Jane, your baby brother has started out in the right way and you must see that he keeps nobly on in the way he has begun. It might be a good thing to have an amendment to the Constitution commanding every citizen to laugh and coo at least two hours every week day and four hours on Sundays. I would like to see such an amendment put to vote. All our Happy Bunch would be for it I know!

SOMEWHERE IN THE WEST.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Here I am, a brand-new relative. Uncle, you tell your Billy I am a red-haired giant and a sure shot with a boulder—that I can hit the goat's-eye every time, at any distance up to 250 millimeters. I guess that will hold him for a while, so here's the real dope: I am almost seventeen years old and have finished my junior year. I am five feet, eight inches tall and weigh 165 pounds. I have rather dark brown hair and gray eyes. I have a double-reinforced khaki complexion from eyebrows to wishbone. Now you know me, I guess; but I have known you for some time. I have read a good many of the letters and among those I remember particularly was one from Texas which told about swimming and 110 degrees in the shade. Also one from Illinois which mentioned mud-balling and washing, and one from Georgia which told about white gloves and clear-cut features. I dearly love clear-cut features, probably because mine aren't. I have also seen one of Ruth's letters and also one each from Cousin Jack and Cousin Gus. I like that name Ruth; I think it sounds sweet and old-fashioned, don't you, Uncle? I know a girl named Ruth and she is a top-notcher. However, I guess we can't accuse Cousin Ruth of being old-fashioned—just see what she is trying to do: flirt with Teddy Carmichael by mail! If she should see one of the tall, dark, curly-haired, hand-some cowpunchers of this locality goosestepping around in chaps and spurs, cowboy hat and leather cuffs—poor Ruth would be racked and torn by strong emotion. And if the youth on whom her ardent gaze first rested happened to be "hittin' for the tall timber" and had a six-gun added to his other attractions, and then walked right by without even looking at her, she'd have the "Ugly American Girl Blues" for sure. Don't get mad now, Ruth; we know you're pretty as a picture even if you are only 29 (or is it 9?) years old.

As for Jack and Gus, I'd like to know that pair. They certainly are real men and not the type that are responsible for the modern flapper. I think they're wrong about the powder, though. For my part, if I knew a girl I wanted more than anything else in the world, she'd need more than a barrage of powder for defense; she'd have to say "no" very firmly and very distinctly several times before I'd consent to relieve her of my presence—and then I'd give her fair warning so she could change her mind if she wanted to.

Gee whiz! What do you boys want, anyhow?—a perfect girl apiece ought to satisfy you without trying to make 'em all perfect. And if the whole bunch did stop powdering over night, it wouldn't make a bit of difference in their characters, and you couldn't tell the bad

WE are all anxious to celebrate when a holiday comes, but quite often in our plans for parties and excursions, we forget to honor the one to whom special honor is due on that day. If you are planning a ...ty for the twenty-second of February try to ...e games that will bring to mind incidents of ...erest in the life of our first President.

...or invitations you can buy blank cards with ... picture of George Washington upon them. If ... a plain card could be decorated with the ...le round picture cut from a postage stamp, ... a sprig of cherries done in water-colors. ...th your name and address write this verse on ... card:

"A man so great as Washington
Should be remembered by everyone,
At eight o'clock, his natal day,
We'll celebrate as best we may."

...ut of the old game of "gestures" you can ...ke a game very appropriate for the occasion. ...ve one or more guests act in pantomime the ...lowing incidents in the life of Washington:

1. Chopping the cherry tree.
2. Breaking his mother's fine colt.
3. His life as surveyor.
4. His marriage to Martha Custis.
5. Crossing the Delaware.
6. Cheering his men at Valley Forge.
7. Consulting with Betsy Ross about the first ...g.
8. Taking the oath of office as the first Presi...nt.

...If they fail to guess the first one when the ...aginary tree is chopped down send in another ... act the part of the father discovering the ...ed, and several will probably guess it at once. ... you like you may take the ones who guess first ... act out the next ones, or you may choose dif...rent ones for each number. The third will take ...o men to show the act of carrying the instru...nts and sighting through them. The fourth ...ll take a man and a girl and another man to ...t the part of the clergyman. The fifth needs ...t one and he would seem to encounter a great ...ny obstacles as he crossed the room peering ...xiously into the dark.

...In six, one man would appear to shiver over a ...e while another came to comfort him. In the ...xt a girl, who is seated, would rise to receive ...visitor who shows her the plan of the flag, she ...uld shake her head and cut out for him the ...e-pointed star instead of the six. The last ...uld need two men and perhaps a Bible to make ... realistic.

..."Crossing the Delaware" would be a good game ... keep the guests moving about. They should be ...vided into two groups and a leader chosen for ...ch group. One leader stations his men about ...e room. They are to be "blocks of ice" and ...ust block the entire room as much as possible, ...t must stand a yard and a quarter apart on ...ery side. The members of the other side must ..., one by one, through this maze of "ice blocks," ...ach the other wall and return if possible with...t being touched. Every time they are touched ...eir side loses one point. The "ice blocks" must ...old their hands tight against their sides and ...eir feet close together, but if they are able to ...an far enough out to touch a person going ...rough with their shoulders or head, their side ...ains one point. But if they lean too far and ...re compelled to move their feet, their side loses ... point. When all the members of one side have ...ad a chance, they become the "ice blocks" and ...e others try to get through. A leader may at ...y time enter the maze to draw attention from ...e of his side who may be in a tight place, but ... he be touched it counts against his side just ...e same.

...An interesting contest would be "Things Wash...gton never saw."

...Write the following rhymes on papers and give ... box of candied cherries as a prize for the largest ...st of correct answers. There are a good many ...hymes given but they are so easily guessed that ...hey will not get tiresome.

If you wish to seat your guests in the dining-room when serving refreshments, you can easily make an imitation cherry tree to decorate your table. A leafy branch (one from a privet hedge would be fine) can be trimmed to look like a tree. You can buy a bunch of artificial cherries at the milliner's, separate them and tie to the tree or you may use cranberries.

Little individual cherry pies are nice to serve with the refreshments. Bake them in gem pans and just before serving cover them with whipped cream and place a maraschino cherry on top of each one. If you would rather serve small cakes, a cherry can be put in the white icing. Cranberry ice with cherries on top would be nice to serve with the cake.

White grapes, bananas, cherries, celery and marshmallow candy chopped fine and mixed with a sweet dressing makes a delicious salad. Serve also sandwiches filled with cream cheese and pimento peppers, and stick a tiny flag into each sandwich.

from the good any more than you can now. Besides, how could you tell a girl lacked sense and good taste unless you saw her primping in public?

By the way, Uncle Lisha, why don't you print more letters from brunettes? I think either you or Bill must be partial to blondes. I like them tall and dark-haired and of robust build.

Well, I have unburdened my mind pretty freely, so maybe I had better hasten the finis and go out for a hunt. Two days ago my brother saw bear signs over on the north slope of the mountain, five miles away (we live on the south slope), and as soon as I finish this I'll climb on my wiry steed and chase over there to investigate. Don't worry about me while I'm gone, for bears are more wild and wary than deer, even. And don't worry about the bear, for it's a hundred to one I won't even see a track, except those my brother saw and I know right where to look for them.

A word to the cousins, if you please, Uncle Lisha, and I will close: If any of you wish very much to write to me, Uncle Lisha knows my name and address, and perhaps he will be kind enough to help you out. I won't guarantee to answer all the letters, though.

Well, "so long," everybody!

Your affectionate relative, JEFF.

Jeff, I didn't know that I was avoiding brunettes and that the blonde-haired were usurping too much space. Just to oblige you, I'll keep an open eye in the future so that a proper shade of capillary balance may be maintained in the League. Bill swears he has had nothing to do with any such favoritism. In fact he swore a lot about it when I mentioned it.

As to these robust brunettes of yours, Jeff, just how robust must they be? I want to hint, because you seem rather young for the experience, that it is possible for a lady, either blonde or brunette, to be too robust. I had a friend who always had to tiptoe up to the back door, when he came home a little late, and listen cautiously before entering. There was always a possibility that his wife was having one of her robust moments and that it was not safe for an unarmed and defenceless male to be in the same neighborhood. Once or twice he entered a trifle too carelessly and his constitution was badly strained and had to be amended in several places. Poor chap! his troubles are over and he is resting quietly now. But these things are warnings.

But with your khaki eyebrows and wishbone you seem to be fairly robust yourself, Jeff, and so you may feel equipped for any of these heavy brunettes. My poor friend was only a bantamweight and stood no chance. However, I wish you would give me statistics as to just what your choice is in weight and height before I start printing these letters from strong-penned brunettes. I have one on hand from a girl in Montana who weighs 273 pounds in her dancing pumps. Would she be too robust, Jeff? She is not so tall—being only four feet, three. I'd like to help anyone along who can write such a good letter as you have sent us.

You are indeed wise, Jeff, not to waste your young life in making all girls perfect. One perfectly robust brunette is certainly all you would want—or even Western marriage laws allow.

Repeat these 2 rows twice more.
Knit next 2 rows.

9th row—Increase 1 st by knitting back and front of the first st, k to end, k last 2 sts together.

PUFF BALL INSERTION.

41st row—Same as 5th row.
42nd row—Same as 6th row.
43rd row—Same as 7th row.
44th row—Same as 8th row.

Continue repeating the row in this way until insertion is the desired length.

In working this pattern care should be taken to have the puff balls all stand out on the one side, thus making a right and a wrong side to this pattern.

To do this the 5 doubles which make the puffs are pushed forward in one row and backward in the next row, before one catches the first and last doubles together as explained in the 2nd row.

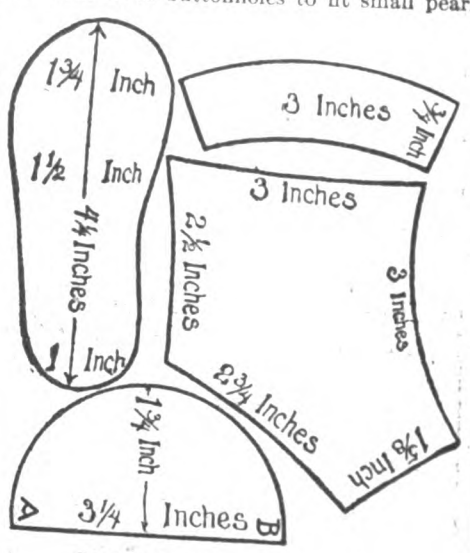
Baby's White Shoes

A warm little home-made shoe can be cut and sewed by hand of either white flannel or kid.

No. 2. HOT PLATE COVERS. No. 1.



The size and shape of the four pieces necessary is given in diagram for shoe. Cut a pattern for each part of paper first.

The sole should be four and one-half inches long, the width across the toe one and three-quarter inches, across the instep one and one-half inches, and from here sloped into about an inch across the heel. The top of the toe practically one-half of a circle one and three-quarters, by three and one-quarter inches in size. The circular edge being joined to the top of the sole.

Two pieces are cut for the sides, shaped as shown according to the dimensions given.

The little three-inch curved piece sews to the center of the front and is buttoned over with three pearl buttons.

After cutting all the different parts, join the back seam of the two sides, then to center front of one side join the buttonhole flap. In this work three buttonholes to fit small pearl

Little Doll's Woolen Suit

Children love lots of dolls and little are especially fascinating. An indestructible one of about four inches is very dainty dressed in a little crocheted and knitted clothes

These may be made so they can be taken and put on as easily as those of much dolls, and this feature alone will appeal to little girl.

Twofold Saxony is best for the tiny and threefold for the dress and jacket.

The color combinations which can be for these wee garments are many and White with either light blue or pink or versa. Crimson trimmed with white is pretty combination which will not show quickly.

Little dolls of china, bisque or even a made rag doll of four inches are very attractive in these little outfits.

The following directions for making garments will be found accurate for a this size.

Bonnet

Cast on 5 sts. Increase 1 st at the beginning of each needle until you have 9 sts. Knit ribs or 4 rows, then decrease at beginning of each needle until you have only 5 sts. Take up 7 sts at side, knit the 5 sts, take up 7 sts up at side, knit the 5 sts, knitting together the posite side, knit 4 ribs, knitting together the 8th and 9th and the 11th and 12th sts of the rib. Bind off on 5th rib. For the border make a single crochet of contrasting shade of wool.

Jacket

Cast on 13 sts. Knit 8 ribs, add 5 sts at each end, knit 5 ribs, cast off 11th, 12th and 13th sts, knit to end of row, knit back 10 sts, leave other 10 sts on needle or work off on sleeve. Cast on 3 sts, knit 4 ribs, this making 10 ribs. Cast on 3 sts, knit 1 rib, 66th row—25 sps, 1 blk, 11 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp.

67th row—1 blk, 10 sps, 2 blks, 26 sps.

This completes one pattern. It is well now to plan on amount one needs for the front allowing for the spaces which come under the arms. If only a little more than three patterns are needed, make a few rows mostly spaces, with just a block or two to connect the work before beginning to repeat the pattern again.

If one desires, the next rose is pretty worked in reverse order, or with the rose up instead of down.

Plan the back, making plain rows, all of spaces on each side and join to first row.

For Shoulder Straps

Ch 16, 1 d c in 4th st from hook, ch 5, 1 s c under ch, ch 5, 1 d c in 2nd st, ch 2, 1 d c in same st, ch 3, turn. 1 shell, 5 d c under ch 2, ch 5, 1 s c on s c, ch 5, 1 shell, turn. 9th row—2 sps, 1 d c, ch 1, as in first row, 2 sps, ch 5, fasten in end of 8th row, slip st to 7th row, turn, 12 d c under ch 5 worked at end of row.

10th row—From here across, same as 2nd row.

11th row—Same as 3rd row. After last 2 sps, 3 d c on 12 d c, 2 k sts, 3 d c on next 3 d c, 2 k sts, 3 d c, 2 k sts, 3 d c. Slip st, from 6th to end of 5th row. Turn work.

12th row—3 d c, keeping last loop of each on hook and working off all three loops together, 2 k sts, sl st to k st in last row, 2 k sts, 3 d c worked as before, on d c, 2 k sts, sl st to k st in last row, 2 k sts, 3 d c on d c, 2 k sts, sl st to k st, 2 k sts, 3 d c, slip st to end of 4th row, turn.

13th row—2 k sts, join to k st, repeat 6 times, finish row same as 5th, ch 5, turn.

14th row—Same as 5th row. Knot sts around scallop, slip st to 3rd row. Turn work.

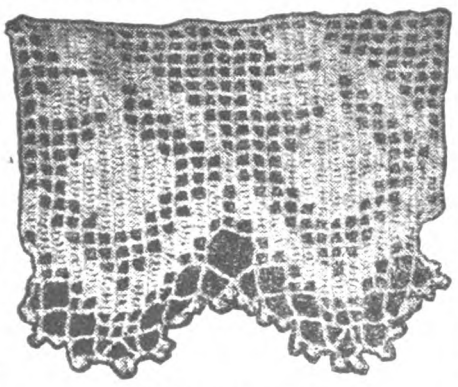
16th row—Same as 7th row to scallop, then ch 3, 1 tr c under chain in center of shell, 1 p, 1 tr c, 1 p, 1 tr c, 1 p, 1 tr c, 1 p, 1 tr c, 1 p, 1 tr c, ch 3, repeat.

This completes one scallop.

Filet Point Edging

It is not often one finds such a simple and easily made filet edging, which is also lacy in effect. Begin with ch 48 sts.



1st row—3 sps, 2 blks, 9 sps, ch 5, turn.

2nd row—7 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 11, turn.

3rd row—1 d c in 8th ch from hook, ch 2, 1 d c on last d c in 2nd row, 2 d c under ch, 4 d c on 4 d c, * 4 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

4th row—5 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 11, turn.

5th row—Work as in 3rd row to * making 2 sps and 2 blks. Then 3 sps, 2 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

FILET POINT EDGING

6th row—3 sps, 2 blks, 3 sps, 4 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 11, turn.

7th row—Work as in 3rd row to *, follow with 3 sps, 6 blks, 3 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

8th row—2 sps, 11 blks, 4 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

This row is the center of the first point, and one works from the straight edge towards the point.

9th row—2 sps, 2 blks, 3 sps, 6 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

10th row—1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 2 sps, 4 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

11th row—2 sps, 2 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

12th row—1 sp, 1 blk, 2 sps, 2 blks, 7 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

13th row—2 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

14th row—11 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

Repeat pattern from 1st row. After length is completed add picot edge to the points by making 1 treble (thread over hook 3 times) under ch at end of 3rd row, ch 5, 1 p, by slip st in 2nd ch, ch 5, 1 p made in same way, ch 3, 1 tr c in same st with first treble.

1 tr c in end sp of 5th row a 2 p, ch 1, tr c in same st with last treble.

2 tr c in end sp of 7th row with 2 p, ch between, ch 1, 1 tr c under double at end of center row of point. 2 p, ch, 1 tr c in same sp, ch 1, 2 tr c with 2 p ch between, worked in sp at end of next row, in end of 11th and 13th rows.

Repeat by working in same way around second point, in the end sps of the 3rd, 5th, 7th center 9th, 11th and 13th rows.

Knitted Bed Socks

Material; Two skeins blue or pink threefold Saxony, two skeins white threefold Saxony, one pair No. 10 steel and one pair No. 12 steel needles, small bone crochet hook, two yards ribbon.

With coarser needles and colored wool cast on 54 stitches.

First four rows—Knit plain, join in white and knit as follows.

With fine steel needles pick up stitches on side and toe with white, picking three stitches in colored ribs and two in white, knit one row narrow in every other row to shape toe, p 1 row, k 1 row, p 1 row.

Next row * k 3 sts in white then 3 with color. Repeat from * to end of row, p back with both colors, k back with both colors to form blocks. Leaving stitches on the needle, pick up the same number of stitches on other side with white and knit in same way and when you begin to make blocks, commence in order to alternate the colors, with white wool bind off the stitches, taking one stitch off each needle.

Finish top with white wool scallop, first crochet row of doubles, one in every other stitch with a chain between each.

2nd row—With colored wool make a shell of 5 d c in every other hole and fasten with a s c.

3rd row—With white wool make picot edge. Draw ribbon through the holes and tie.

Diamond Point Knit Doily

Any size thread may be used and suitable steel needles, but the finer the material and needles the smaller the finished work will be.

The Love Affairs of A. Lincoln

by Carol C. Crain

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

EARLY in life Lincoln realized his handicaps as a suitor. Awkward, uncultured, with a seamed and swarthy face, shock headed, a protruding nose, arms so lean and long that they made him a ludicrous figure—these were enough to make Abe shy and doubtful of his ability as an entertainer of the girls of the New Salem neighborhood.

But when love comes into a man's life, nothing stops him. At the age of twenty-six he "took a shine," as the gossips said, to Anne Rutledge, whose father founded the town. She had an admirer, John McNamara, who picturesquely described her as "a blonde in complexion, with golden hair, cherry-red lips, and bonny blue eyes."

His bashfulness melted before this attractive maiden. He even went so far as to call upon her in the daytime which was a violation of the existing social custom that stipulated night hours for sweethearts. He wooed her at quilting bees. For him she sang hymns, particularly one beginning, "Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?"

The great hour came. Lincoln, with his heart tumbling like Niagara Falls, confessed his hope. When he paused in his appeal, she sorrowfully denied him and avowed she was pledged to McNamara who had gone to New York with a promise to come back and provide a home for her. Though his letters had ceased, she could not conscientiously do otherwise than refuse her lanky friend.

At various times Lincoln renewed his case and used his utmost persuasive power to win her, but Anne remained firm. After some months, with Lincoln pleading her to write McNamara and ask to be released, she finally agreed. Weeks passed without an answer. The nervous strain proved too great, and brain fever caused the death of Abe's sweetheart.

"His grief became frantic," said an old neighbor of the desperate lover. "He lost all self-control, even the consciousness of identity, and everybody in New Salem pronounced him insane."

Haggard and bowed at twenty-six, his friends feared he might never regain his composure. One of his close associates, Bowling Green, hustled him away to a lonely log cabin. There he moaned time and again, "I can never be reconciled to have the snow, rains and storms beat upon her grave."

It is strange but true that the difference between genius and insanity cannot be clearly defined, that one seems to glide into the other, and that the greatest men have had peculiarities and symptoms of derangement. Perhaps some day there may appear a psychist who, by some simple method, will lift the inmates of asylums over the indistinguishable line into the field of genius.

But Abe Lincoln came back a changed man. Melancholy and a wisdom born out of travail were relieved only by humor which he must have consciously developed to offset his sadness. Years afterward at the White House an acquaintance asked him about his courtship of Anne Rutledge. His seamed face paled as he replied:

"I have loved the name of Rutledge to this day, and I loved Anne dearly. She was a handsome girl, would have made a good, loving wife, was natural and quite intellectual though not highly educated. I did honestly and truly love Anne. I think often, often of her even now."

The next year Lincoln revived his interest in politics and became a candidate for the legislature of Illinois. He made a four square declaration of principles of which one was the extension of suffrage to women. His election followed. As one of the "Long Nine" so called because every member of the Sangamon delegation overtopped six feet in stature) he waxed influential and began to feel the need of a helpmate. When the capital was moved to Springfield, he noted "a good deal of flourishing about in carriages here" which resulted in a ripening affection for Mary Owens.

Lincoln, no longer bashful, assiduously courted her. She was witty, pleasure-loving, her curly hair was dark, and her complexion fair. This Kentucky belle apparently expected the legislator to marry her and he had, indeed, in a bantering mood made the promise to Mary's wedded sister who lived in New Salem. Abe felt obligated, but not satisfied.

"I am determined," he told a friend, "to put all my powers of discovery to work in search of perfections in her which might have been fairly set off against her defects."

He assured her that, as his wife, she "would be poor, without the means of concealing her poverty." At a later time he told her, "I am not at all sure that I should make you the sort of husband with whom you would be most happy."

She seemed inclined to hold him to his jesting promise. He doubtless believed that nothing could equal his first love and that marriage would not be a success, for after a time he cautiously wrote:

"If you feel yourself in any way bound to me, I am now willing to release you, provided you wish it; while, on the other hand, I am willing to bind you faster, if I can be convinced that it will in any considerable degree add to your happiness."

As Lincoln probably intended it should, this letter evoked an acidulous reply which amounted to a definite refusal. Long afterward she wrote Abe's law partner, W. H. Herndon, her reason for rejecting the powerful leader of Sangamon's famous "Long Nine."

"Mr. Lincoln," she asserted, "was deficient in those little links which make up the chain of a woman's happiness—at least it was so in my case. Not that I believed that it proceeded from a lack of goodness of heart; but his training had been different from mine. Hence there was not that congeniality that would have otherwise existed."

An interval of two years followed and then A. Lincoln (invariably his signature in his letters) met another Kentucky girl, Mary Todd, visiting at the home of her sister in Springfield. She spoke French fluently, had a caustic wit, and a high temper. That she possessed high ideals is disclosed in her statement to a friend:

"I would rather marry a good man, a man of mind, with hope and bright prospects ahead for position, fame and power, than to marry all the horses, gold and bones in the world."

Miss Todd numbered among her suitors Stephen A. Douglas and James Shield, both more prominent at that time than Lincoln. Her family opposed the former rail-splitter on the ground that with his humble birth he would have no future, but she seemed bent upon marrying him. She is alleged to have told her relatives:

"His heart is as large as his arms are long. Some day I shall land him in the White House."

The event was scheduled for New Year's, 1841. As the date approached, the face of Lincoln took on a worried look. Perhaps he was wondering if he could care as much for Mary as he had for Anne Rutledge. He disliked Mary's volcanic temper and feared he could not be happy with her. One day in her presence he offended her greatly by mentioning the coming "fateful first of January."

When the day arrived, the bride and the guests assembled. A long wait ensued—where was Abraham? He came not, for he had run away and during many days could not be located. When friends did find him and told him of the mortification of the clergyman, guests and Mary, he bewailed:

"The thought that I made her unhappy kills my soul."

The people considered him "crazy as a loon," as he was indeed. He sank into the depths of melancholy, his friends asserted he would die if he did not brace up, but he told them: "I am not afraid to die and would be more than willing."

Joshua Speed, probably his closest comrade, took him away to the fields of Kentucky to recuperate. The new scenes improved his mind, and displaced his apparent desire to end everything. In a lucid moment he wrote to a former partner, John T. Stuart of Springfield:

"I am now the most miserable man living. If what I feel were equally distributed to the whole human family, there would not be one cheerful face on earth. To remain as I am is impossible. I must die or be better, as it appears to me."

Speed himself was engaged to an attractive girl. When he and Lincoln returned to Illinois, the latter seemed much interested in the approaching nuptial event of his chum. Eight months after the ceremony had been performed "Honest Abe" wrote to inquire "if you are, in feeling as well as in judgment, glad that you are married?" Speed forwarded an enthusiastic affirmation.

In the meantime Abe and Mary had renewed their friendship. She had been doing for a local newspaper some brilliant satirical articles directed against James Shields, then Auditor of State. These contributions appeared unsigned with the caption of "Letters from Lost Townships." From the editor Shields demanded the name of the author, and the newspaper man consulted with Lincoln who assumed the responsibility.

The upshot of the whole business was a challenge from the offended Irishman. Lincoln, having the choice of weapons, selected "cavalry broadswords of the largest size." Now Shields was a little man with short arms whereas Abe towered high and had a reach in excess of any other man of the state. Arrived at the duelling ground, Shields perceived Abe's expertness at lopping off tree branches and permitted himself to be persuaded into a reconciliation.

"I did not want to kill Shields," Lincoln subsequently explained. "I felt sure I could disarm him, having had about a month to learn the broadsword exercise. Furthermore, I didn't want the darned fellow to kill me, which I rather think he would have done if we had selected pistols."

This abortive duel brought Abe and Mary still closer together, as she admired his bravery in defending her even to the extent of risking his life. On the fourth day of November, 1842, the two of them faced an Episcopalian minister at Springfield. An observer described the groom as "pale and trembling as if being driven to slaughter."

The ceremony proceeded smoothly until Lincoln placed the ring on the bride's finger and repeated "with this ring I thee wed and with all my worldly goods I thee endow." At that moment Thomas C. Browne, judge of the Supreme Court, whispered so loudly that everybody heard:

"Good gracious, Lincoln, the statutes fix all that."

The marriage proved, if not absolutely ideal, to be such as not to interfere with his career. Mary's ambition and optimism offset the melancholy of her husband and cheered him to make good in everything he attempted. Though they were poor, the board for both of them cost only four dollars a week. In the following May his old friend, Speed, received a letter characteristically signed "A. Lincoln" and saying:

"We are not keeping house but boarding at the Globe Tavern which is very well kept now by a widow lady.....I most heartily wish you and your Fanny will not fail to come. We'll all be merry together for a while."

To Save Darning Stockings

A hint which may be of value to others especially families who possess a grandmother who loves to knit, comes from a Minnesota reader who is the mother of five boys. She says:

"My many household duties did not leave me time enough to keep up with the family darning, so there was always a bag full of stockings until grandmother had a bright idea. To occupy her spare moments she knitted extra heels and toes of black silkateen on fine needles.

These are put inside the heels and toes of stockings, the edges of the holes being caught down, but not too closely as they can not be ripped out easily.

The extras wear splendidly and lengthen the life of stocking and socks a great deal. They also make the repairing of good-sized holes but the work of a few moments.

The Single Wire Aerial

THE aerial, generally speaking, is one of the most neglected parts of the radio set, and the beginner usually places some sort of a tangle of wires atop the building, or to a nearby tree and lets it go at that. If one takes the trouble to look about a little he will see all sorts of aerials, from the highly ornamental cage antenna to the simple single wire straight aerial. It is the aerials that come in between these that, at present, engages the eyes and mind of the passer-by who is interested in radio. The city is really the place to observe these aerials and a trip on the elevated railroad will prove a revelation as far as the engineering skill of the average American boy goes.

One will see what are known as flat top aerials, both of the "T" and the inverted "L" type. This means that the lead-in from the "T" aerial is from the middle and from the inverted "L" type from one end. The majority of these aerials have two wires in them, but many of them are equipped with four and six wires. If the builders only knew it, they would get exactly the same results from a single wire the same length as the multi-wire aerial, with a saving in wire as well as labor. In other words, the aerial that is composed of, say, four wires, each one being 100 feet long, will give practically the same results as a single wire aerial 100 feet long.

Many beginners cannot seem to understand this, and insist on putting up great heavy contrivances that only cost a great deal more money with the added fact that the results are not a bit better.

The single wire aerial is by far the easiest to erect, and, as stated above, the builder will be able to save money by doing so, and at the same time be able to get the same results. However, there are several different types of these single wire aerials. Some of them run in a straight line and others will run off at right angles after perhaps half of their total length has been traversed. Then there is the worst kind of the lot, the kind that zigzags back and forth across a roof, or in and out around trees. The builder must remember that what really counts is the length of the aerial in a straight line. If an aerial has a total of 100 feet of wire in it and the first fifty feet runs in one direction and then the rest of the aerial runs at right angles or back on itself in the form of a "V," the first fifty feet will be the part that actually gives the signal strength, and the rest of the aerial will be useless.

THE AERIAL AND GROUND

DETAILS OF SINGLE WIRE AERIAL.

The best aerial for the reception of broadcasting and other forms of radio messages is the single wire aerial from 100 to 200 feet long, run all in one direction with the lead-in from one end and never from the middle. If the lead-in is taken from the middle, the tendency is to really get the same results that would be secured with an aerial only one-half as long. In other words, one end of the aerial is absolutely wasted. Never put any bends in the wire if the best results are wanted.

There are many different kinds of so-called patented and indoor aerials on the market, but the best by far is the one described above, if properly installed. Use No. 14 bare copper wire for the aerial and the lead-in wire, but just before the wire comes into the house, make a soldered joint and have the rest of the wire of the same size, but rubber insulated. It is best to run this wire through a porcelain tube where it actually enters the house as a safeguard against having the minute currents leak off to the ground during wet weather. CAUTION:—When wiring your set, take care that the lead-in wire and inside ground wire are kept away from all 110-volt telephone or electric light wiring.

Procure two or three small porcelain cleat insulators and install them at the end of the aerial that is farthest away and also at the end that is above where the lead-in is fastened. Do not let the wire touch anything outside of these insulators while it is outdoors and be sure to use insulated wire wherever it is run inside of the house. If one end of the aerial is attached to a tree, use a rope and pulley with a weight on the end to keep the aerial taut when the tree sways. (See illustration.) The ground wire should be of the same size wire and there must be some sort of a protection against atmospheric electricity. This is misnamed a lightning arrester and should be mounted outdoors for the best results, and an independent ground used in connection with it. The best ground connections for the actual set is the cold water pipe. Scrape this clean and lead the ground wire to it, taking about a dozen tight turns about the pipe, finishing them off with a pair of pliers so that the connection cannot be moved at all by hand. Then as a further assurance of a good connection, clean the wire and the pipe thoroughly and solder the whole joint. This part of the set is just as important as the aerial and must be carefully made.

The ground for the lightning arrester may be made by driving an iron pipe into the ground and soldering a heavy piece of wire to it. Another and better scheme is to bury all of the old metal that can be found, first soldering a wire so that contact is made to each separate piece. If a bag of charcoal is thrown in on top of this before the hole is filled in, and then several buckets of water are thrown over this, it will be found that after the dirt has been replaced that the earth will stay damp for a very long time and a good connection is assured. The lightning arrester above serves to drain off the atmospheric electricity gradually instead of letting the aerial save it all up and then discharge it with a rush through the receiving set. In other words, the lightning arrester acts as a safety valve to allow the surplus energy to gradually escape harmlessly to the earth.

Fear of lightning seems to be one of the inborn characteristics of the human being, and justly so, as there has been a great deal of damage done to lives and property through this cause.

No doubt more people would own radio sets if it were not for this fear, for many people still believe that steel knives and scissors, needles, wire netting, etc., "attract" lightning and they naturally feel that a radio set would be even a greater danger to their premises. This is not so, as a properly installed aerial acts as a splendid lightning-rod and actually safeguards the premises on which it is erected.

It is not practicable to use your set during a thunder storm, due to the "static" electricity in the air, and the confusion of the wireless waves.

Doubtless most of the readers of COMFORT are what we term "handy men" and no instruction relative to soldering is necessary, but a few words on this subject might not be amiss for those who perchance have not had the experience in this work.

Soldering

In any radio set, whether home-made or otherwise, there are countless little joints and connections that should be soldered, the neglect of which will cause innumerable noises in the headphones.

It is no great trick to solder, the process being a simple one, but it is necessary to acquire the "knack" of doing it first. So before attempting to actually solder any joints or connections on your set take a few pieces of wire and odd bits of metal and practice soldering. You will soon get into the swing of it, and can make a neat job of it when you tackle your set. The United States Navy specifications on radio sets clearly states that "all connections be soldered," and the novice cannot underestimate the necessity of following out this specification himself when building his own set.

As previously stated, loose connections and bad contacts will cause no end of trouble and discomfiture to the radio fan. It only takes a very small amount of energy (measured in millionths of an ampere) to operate the telephone receivers, and if the incoming signals are to be as loud as possible, we must carefully "baby along" every ounce of energy possible in the telephone circuit. Loose connections and bad joints offer a very high resistance to the easy flow of radio current, and much energy that is lost could well be used to give loud signals in the receivers.

Badly soldered connections, however, are worse than loose ones, so take particular pains and pride in your work and the results obtained will be justified by the fine performance of your radio set. A soldered circuit not only looks better but works better.

For the soldering job you will need a small copper soldering iron, some soldering flux, such as rosin or a soldering paste, a file, emery cloth, a bunsen burner or alcohol lamp and some soft wire solder. (Be sure to get soft solder. There are other grades of solder that are not at all suited to the fine work necessary on radio instruments.)

The first thing to remember is that it is always very necessary to have the surfaces to be soldered perfectly clean. They might look clean, and you might think that they were, but do not be satisfied until you use a file or a piece of emery cloth on them. You must be absolutely sure, as solder will not flow freely on unclean surfaces.

The next point to remember is to heat and tin the end of the soldering iron. Clean the iron thoroughly with a file or emery cloth and hold in the flame of the bunsen burner or alcohol lamp until the flame begins to turn a bluish-green. The iron is now at the proper temperature. Apply a little soldering flux (rosin or a soldering paste) to the end of the iron with a matchstick, and then place the end of the solder against the hot point of the iron. The solder will melt immediately and stick to the surface of the iron, forming a bright layer of solder on the end of the tool. It is now ready for use.

Next, see that surfaces cleaned are properly tinned. To do this, apply some soldering flux, and run the hot tinned iron over the surface. A small amount of solder will flow freely, and the surface is ready to be soldered. (CAUTION—Do not use too much flux—a very little will do—for if any drops down into your cabinet it will collect dust, and in time form an excellent conductor, on the principle of the grid leak.)

When you think you have practiced sufficiently to be able to tackle your set, clean and tin the iron and parts to be soldered as before, place the parts together and apply the hot iron. The solder will run freely. When you remove the iron the solder on the joint or connection will quickly set. It is well not to use too much solder as it will form into a big lump and make an unsightly joint. Practice will enable you to tell just how much to use.

In the next issue we will take up the actual construction of a simple crystal detector set.

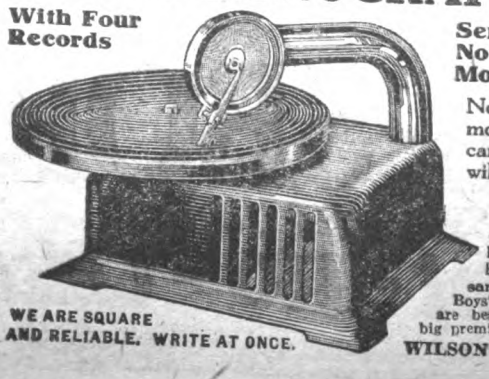
This Free Book Tells How



Make Your Own Wireless Telephone

WIRELESS telephone receiving sets are comparatively easy to make. The man or boy with any mechanical ability whatever should be able to construct his own receiving apparatus by following the instructions in this book. The different parts that go to make up Radio receivers may now be purchased in almost any hardware or general store. Many of the parts can be made at home. This book shows you how to assemble them so as to make a receiving set which if purchased outright would cost many times what you pay for the component parts. It tells how to make not only one, but several different styles of receivers. It illustrates and describes every step of the process and the instructions are easy to understand because technical terms are avoided wherever possible.

Written by twenty Radio experts, this book is, for its size, one of the most authoritative yet published. It is 7½x5½ inches in size, contains one hundred pages and ninety illustrations and diagrams. Also in the back of the book is the official application blank of the Radio League of America and full instructions as to you becoming a member and receiving a membership certificate and button. We will send you a copy of this book if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you this book telling you how to make your own Wireless Telephone, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8701.

Probably when you get through with high school and the chasing of dark-haired and robust bears, you will be able to look out from under your khaki eyebrows and make an agreeable and powerful choice. Anyway your bear-hunting will be good training, Bill says.

WAXA, R. R. B., BOX 253, TEXAS,

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I'm a little boy twenty-three years old and my mamma's pet. I live on a farm of 114 acres with my pa. I like to farm fine, except pick cotton and I won't do that at all. I have a car of my own—oh, I mean a Ford.

I guess you will want to know what I look like: I am five feet, ten inches tall and weigh 147 pounds. I have light curly hair and blue eyes. I would like to hear from all the cousins and will answer all I can if I have to sell a bale of cotton to buy stamps. All that can please send photos.

Your nephew, ALVIN ANDERSON.

Alvin, how do you suppose our country's cotton crop is going to get picked if everybody who dislikes to do it refuses the job and goes off to town in a Ford to shoot a game of pool? I think "mamma's pet" ought to be spanked, even if it takes a fence rail to do the trick.

It is "little boys" who can profit from good advice, Alvin, and I want to tell you that for every duty or hard job we evade, somebody has to work all the harder to do our share. This is not playing the game fair and will never win in the end. Go ahead and do your part of the cotton picking, Alvin, as you do in all the rest of the work on pa's farm. Anyway you will have to pick a bale, you know, to buy your postage stamps. You might put a bag on the nose of your Ford and go down between the rows.

Alvin, I hope lots of little girls will write to you and prevent "mamma's pet" from being too lonesome down among the unpicked cottonfields of Waxa.

MINNEAPOLIS, 262 LYNDALE AVE., N., MINN.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Will you admit a very interested cousin from the Gopher State to the family circle? Greetings, everybody! I love every one of you and I hope you will love me, too. Needless to say I enjoy reading the cousins' letters, especially those dealing critically with the girl of today. I admit it is undeniably true that some girls conduct themselves outrageously, and I admire the young men who have brains enough to avoid such girls. Sad but true, the majority of boys haven't will power enough to do this, and so the poor creatures drift on with the idea firmly planted in their brains that they can hold a candle to Theda Bara or somebody like her—all because some brainless idiots allow themselves to be vamped and give them a few tastes of what they think is the wine of life. Whenever I see an especially freakish lunatic, who is whitewashed and rouged to her heart's content, I become the possessor of a very burning desire to box her ears properly and wash her face thoroughly. Of course, at the same time, I wouldn't forget to lengthen her skirt a couple of inches and add some material to her lowest blouse. I am very much in favor of powder, but I do not look ill after I have used it; if I did, my mother would rely on the trustworthy hickory stick and administer that time-honored remedy—an old-fashioned spanking! And I'm quite sure, Uncle Lisha, that you would enjoy assisting mother and would agree with me when I say I would have deserved it.

Some girls, in their drug store complexions, that parade the streets nowadays in search of a good time, remind me of an Indian on the warpath, and I wish to say they are as brainless as they look. Naturally I realize that all girls aren't of this type, and I beg to remark that the right sort of an all round American girl cannot be beat.

However, I admit I'm practically convinced that the majority of the boys of today are mentally unbalanced, or in slang, just "plain bugs." At least their actions would lead one to this conclusion. Now you who are ready to condemn me, collect your scattered brains and do a little thinking. I will give you a few examples. I won't divide my specimens into different classes, for the simple reason that if a person does one base thing, he usually does the others, too. Of course, there are exceptions. What do you say about the fellows found on every street corner, who say coarse and indelicate things about every girl that passes—whether she is decent or indecent? Usually they have an evil-smelling cigarette drooping limply from one corner of their mouths, while cuss words and other vile things issue freely from the other. And when you are past such a specimen, he yells such endearing names as, "Hello, sweetie," and, "Hello, cutie." Oh, yes; I agree with you that some girls do not mind it one bit. When he finally does decide to leave his place at the pool hall and go home, he is often so "stewed" that he isn't responsible for his actions, and the milkman has to help him find the right house. Now what's the verdict? I just knew you'd say that you would call him a cur and not a gentleman. But, my dear friends, do you think that we would call our young painted warriors ladies? Of course there are many other ungentlemanly things the above-mentioned boys do, but they are too numerous to mention, and so I must content myself with the few I have named. I admit that there are boys of the minority who are a pretty decent lot, but I think this is partly due to the fact that most of them are farm-bred boys, or boys who live their lives in the open where their brains haven't a chance of getting warped. Of course, there are a few nice boys in the city, but, mind you, I said few—and you require a microscope to find them. The boys love to babble about the degrading things the girls do, but oh, how they hate to hear about their own faults. I'm inclined to think that the boys are worse than the girls. I, for one, am going to declare war on the little mamma's boys running about, who use the adage: "It is the truth that hurts," to hide behind. And on the pretty little boy angels with beautiful gauzy wings who hate to be reminded of the "lounge lizard", and of that part of their sex which, too, employs a drug store complexion to enhance their manly beauty. Can anyone among the cousins tell me why the boys enjoy reminding the decent girls about the indecent part of their sex, but change the subject as soon as someone mentions "lounge lizards," etc.? It certainly is a mystery to me. Perhaps some of the cousins who have been keeping their opinion of the "superior sex" to themselves will lend a helping hand to me. Perhaps we will be able to impress upon the boys that it is a rather dangerous occupation to throw stones when one is living in a glass house.

I have an idea many of you are convinced by this time that I am either an old maid or a confirmed manhater. Sorry to disappoint you, but I'm neither. I'm just sweet(?) sixteen and believe in enjoying life in the best and cleanest way possible.

Will some of the cousins please write to me. I will try to answer every letter I receive.

Sincerest wishes to Uncle Lisha and all the Cousins.

INEZ ROSE.

Inez Rose, you are a rose with good sharp thorns! And you use these vigorously in pricking masculine weaknesses—at the same time giving a prod or two at the foolish younglings of your own sex. You come holding well and bravely aloft the feminine banner of your newly declared war, and rash boy critics are going to have much broken glass tumbling about their ears. I'm sure many like-minded nieces will hear your call and rally to your standard—Cousin Ruth of Minnesota, for instance, will be a neighbor and cousin who I'm certain will take up a position by your side.

Your letter of judgment concerning boys and girls who are too deep in their silly season, Inez, is good criticism and well expressed. It will leave little room for the escape of those whom you verbally biff. But your letter might have been more tolerant if you had not had to draw your lessons and "specimens" from boys and girls of city life and breeding. You hint at this yourself when you except from your awful specimens farm boys and those who have out-of-door occupations to leave them clearer-eyed, clearer-lunged and clearer-minded. Corner standees and poolroom artists are unfortunate debris of youth which cities readily accumulate. For it is in cities, Inez, that corners are many, that pool-

New Prosperity for Poultry People

THE price of eggs is high now, and will be higher. The big boost that President Harding gave the American poultry industry when he signed the Fordney tariff bill last September has now commenced to be felt in the open market. In Boston and New York, new laid eggs are bringing $1.10 per dozen, and this is only the beginning. The high tariff placed on foreign poultry and eggs will prevent the repetition of the heavy shipments from China which came in last year to flood our markets and lower prices. The new tariff taxes every pound of eggs in the shell eight cents; preserved eggs, six cents a pound; dried eggs, 18 cents a pound; chickens, six cents a pound. No foreign country will think it worth while sending eggs or chickens with such a tariff, so the signing of the Fordney bill has effectually protected the American poultry industry, and made 1922 the beginning of a golden era for us poultry people, big or little. And even the women with only a few hens or a small back lot will reap the benefit of the high prices, and the farm woman who can go ahead and double or even treble the number of her chickens can be sure of a substantial return far in excess of anything in the past, for you must remember that there is no fear of overproduction in the matter of eggs. Just think, we have a population of one hundred and ten million people in this great country of ours, so at the very lowest figure it requires 770,000,000 eggs a week to provide one a day for each person, and when you consider the immense quantities of eggs which are used in cooking every day, the number required to meet the demand becomes positively appalling. Having won the fight, and shut out foreign supplies by a tariff, it is up to us to produce more and better chickens and eggs, which of course means devoting more time and care to them. If the rural country at large does not do this, we shall be short of eggs next fall to meet the demand, and lose our big chance to make substantial incomes from our poultry.

The foundation of winter eggs is good breeding stock and lots of early chickens, which of course necessitates the use of incubators and setting all the hens one can, and following up the hatch with intelligent management of brooders and feeding and care of young chicks. During the first two or three days in the brooder the youngsters must be watched closely to make sure that they learn the source of heat. Constant attention is frequently necessary to develop the chicks' bump of location and until this is achieved the best plan is to confine nearer the hover or stove with the aid of a few boards or a piece of fine mesh wire. A circular piece of twelve-inch wire is preferable, since it eliminates all corners in which the chicks can huddle or crowd. Every time the hover is visited the chicks should be pushed gently under the hover or near the stove until they are thoroughly hover-broke. The wire enclosure should gradually be enlarged, allowing more floor space after the first day or so, and removed entirely as soon as the chicks can safely be allowed the freedom of the brooder or colony house.

This particular part of the work will call for patience on the part of the poultryman, for at first the chicks will persist in huddling in every convenient place except under the stove or hover. Usually, however, two or three days of close attention is all that is required to teach the youngsters the source of heat.

As soon as they are put in the brooder the chicks should be supplied with milk or water in shallow fountains and taught to drink. The easiest and quickest way to do this is to dip the bills of a few chicks in the liquid and then release them. Repeat the operation until they have learned how to drink. As soon as two or three have discovered the process the others will become interested, and the trick is accomplished.

At the end of the first week, if the weather is pleasant, the chicks may be allowed the liberty of a small yard. At first they will be slow to avail themselves of this new privilege. Do not attempt to hurry them, but let them come out of their own free will.

Now, unless you want chilled chickens and a peck of trouble, do not make the fatal mistake of assuming that because the chicks found their way out of the brooder it necessarily follows that they know how to get in again when they feel the need of heat. This is exactly what they do not know, and if they are not driven back into the brooder or colony house several times during the first day or so, they are apt to become fatally chilled because of the neglect to teach them this simple lesson.

The runway from the exit door to the ground should be of dirt, so that the chicks can run up from any angle. If a strip of board is used the chicks seem to lose all power of sight, and insist on running around and under it when you are trying to get them back into the brooder.

After several days the yard should be doubled in size so as to give the youngsters more liberty and fresh ground to pasture on. As they get older the yard space must be increased until they can be given free range.

The best brooders and the most scientifically balanced rations cannot produce strong, healthy chickens unless their quarters are kept clean and sanitary and free from vermin. The area under the hover must be cleaned daily and covered with fine litter or clean sand. No set rule can be given for renewing the litter in the nursery or on the floor of the colony house, but it should always be removed before it becomes damp or foul smelling. In most cases, every seven days for the first four weeks will be none too frequent. If a small quantity of coal tar disinfectant is used each time the litter is used, the brooder can be kept sweet and clean with very little trouble.

If any lice or mites are found in the brooder or on the chicks, steps should be taken at once to eradicate them. The chicks should be dusted with lice powder and the interior of the brooder or colony house thoroughly sprayed with some good commercial liquid lice killer. One application will not always suffice to rid the premises of these troublesome enemies.

There are a number of ailments or diseases which cause the loss of untold numbers of chicks every spring. The most common of these include gapes, bowel trouble, c[illegible] leg weakness, drooping wings and general a[illegible]nia. As doctoring little chicks is practically out of the question, the cure for these various maladies is to be found in their prevention by good all-round management. Colds and kindred troubles are usually caused by damp, dirty, poorly ventilated quarters and irregular temperatures. Bowel trouble and digestive disorders are the result of unsuitable feed and improper methods of feeding. Leg weakness can generally be traced to close confinement and the too liberal use of rich food lacking ash or bone building material. Drooping wings and anemia are, for the most part brought about by a combination of poor methods of management and haphazard feeding, but in some instances chilling or overheating are directly responsible for these maladies.

First Class Digestive Organs

During the first few days, while the chicks' digestive organs are just beginning to function, special care in feeding is desirable. After that they can eat and digest any wholesome feed that is suitable for older fowls. When boiled down, the only radical difference between rations for chicks and fowls is the size of the ingredients used. In other words, anything that hens can digest is suitable for chicks if broken up in pieces small enough for them to swallow.

The beginner is prone to overlook this fact, and to give undue consideration to the question of rations and methods of feeding. These are of only relative importance, for success in feeding during the brooding period is not dependent on any particular ration, but is primarily a matter of good management and a practical working knowledge of the chick's requirements under various conditions. The young chick, while tender and easily injured by extremes of heat and cold, is endowed with a first-class set of digestive organs. If it is kept comfortably warm in clean, well ventilated quarters, it will thrive and grow on almost any sensible combination of clean, wholesome feed, intelligently fed.

Some idea of the chick's power to digest and assimilate feed may be gained by comparing its rate of growth during the first few weeks with that of humans and other animals. The average weight of a chick at hatching is an ounce and a half. It doubles this weight in six days, and under good conditions it is not unusual for it to weigh a pound at the end of eight weeks. This is more than ten times its original weight.

Yet, notwithstanding the chick's apparent power to utilize food efficiently, we must not overlook the fact that this situation obtains only when the chicks are in good physical condition. If our methods of feeding and management are not conducive to a high degree of health, we will soon come to grief, no matter what kind or combinations of feeds may be used. Therefore it is highly desirable that we understand the essential requirements that must be observed in connection with whatever ration may be used.

To begin with, baby chicks can consume only a small quantity of feed at a time; and as this is digested rapidly, it is necessary that they be fed frequently, until their capacity in this respect increases. The safe rule for the beginner is to feed little and often. During the first week or two they should be fed at least four or five times a day. After that the number of meals may be reduced gradually to the regular schedule followed for the older fowls.

While it is not absolutely necessary that the feed given for the first two or three days need be different from the regular ration, the general practice is to supply some special, easily digested material at the start. Many successful growers save the infertile eggs from the incubator for use during this period. These are hard-boiled, run through a meat chopper, shells included, and then mixed with five times their bulk in dry bread-crumbs or rolled oats. To this is added a liberal sprinkle of fine chick grit, working the ingredients together by rubbing between the hands. Other feeds commonly include bread-crumbs moistened with milk and then squeezed dry, johnny-cake, pinhead oatmeal, and commercial chick starters.

Shallow trays made of light wood or galvanized iron will be found very convenient for feeding the oatmeal and egg as well as the ground-grain mixtures used later on.

Suitable feeding equipment also invites clean feeding, a matter that is of the utmost importance during the early part of the chick's life. Slightly moist feed quickly sours in the warm brooder temperature, and unless the excess is removed after each feeding, some of it is sure to be consumed by the chicks after it becomes unwholesome. Trouble results in the form of intestinal disorders and diarrhea.

Watch Out for Moldy Feed

As most of the hard grains will be scattered in the litter until the chicks are weaned, it must be renewed frequently to insure clean feeding. When large numbers of chicks are confined to a relatively small area, such as is necessary in artificial brooding, the litter is quickly soiled by the excrement of birds. If allowed to remain after it becomes foul, trouble will follow.

Musty, moldy or partly decomposed food should never be used under any consideration. In home mixed rations special precautions must be taken to see that the beef scraps, corn or corn products—which are the ingredients most likely to be off color—are of the best grade. Moldy corn can easily be detected. It has a decidedly bitter taste.

The increasing difficulty of securing ingredients of suitable size and quality for home mixed rations has led many to depend entirely upon the

The MODERN FARMER

February: The Reading Month

TO sit in front of a cheery, sparkling fireplace or beside a warm, crackling stove is a joy and opportunity that reaches its highest point of perfection for farm folks in February. But simply to sit in-doors in comfort, forgetful of the snow and cold outside, is not all that is needed for relaxation and rest. Something more is required to round out the idle hours of the farmer and his wife and children—yes, children, bless their carefree little hearts. Perhaps you have guessed it before we write it down? Reading! How dull the long winter evenings would be without the farm paper, books and bulletins for the grownups and picture books and stories for the little ones. Reading brings the whole world to the farmer's door—current events, broadening information, politics, facts and fiction are his for the taking, gained without contact with the city which is not always so entrancing and attractive as it sometimes appears to the eyes and imaginations of country dwellers. Too many have learned to their everlasting sorrow that the healthful life, fresh air and independence of country life is too much to give up in exchange for the environment of squalor, poverty and crime "where the bright lights burn at night."

But to return to our topic—reading. We who read know and appreciate in a measure how much it means to us. But do we ever stop to consider the many farmers who do not read? Ponder on that a moment. Perhaps here is a place where each of us may perform a valuable service—a sort of missionary service right in our own neighborhood. Why not try this:

No doubt you "swap work" with your neighbor occasionally? Then why not go a step further and hand him one of your old copies of COMFORT to read? You and your family have gleaned its contents from cover to cover, but the good things it contains have not been removed by your reading, and they will be new to him.

We assume that your neighbor is a stranger to us, but no doubt you know him well. You know his little likes and dislikes, his strong points, weak points and peculiarities. Talk to him about his "hobby," then point out to him an article or item dealing with his pet subject in your paper. He may perhaps be indifferent to knowledge and to his own best interests; he may be a shiftless, unsuccessful farmer with a large family. The two somehow seem to go together, don't they? Still, he is human, and curiosity is one of the pillars of human nature. His curiosity can be aroused, you may be certain. He will read your old paper to satisfy that curiosity, or at any rate he will look at the pictures. Even that is worth something, a step in the right direction. The donated copy may prove to be the entering wedge, the slender string upon which the growing vine of inquisitiveness climbs upward to the light of broadened information.

It is sad but true that the man who most needs the influence of the farm paper is the very one who is too indifferent to his own needs and to his personal success and advancement to subscribe. Little can be done for the indifferent man. The old saying about leading the horse to water applies in his case. Nevertheless, there is always a chance and the chance is worth taking. You may be in a position to arouse a latent interest and inspire in another one of God's creatures a growing desire to reach out and up to the more worthy things of life.

Your old, well-read, dog-eared copy of COMFORT may be the means of creating another "reading farmer" like yourself, and reading farmers are the very mainstay and foundation of our rural life. The reading farmer is the thinking farmer, the man who knows. He lives comfortably and contentedly in a horizon broadened by his reading, makes more money and spends it more wisely and to better advantage, talks intelligently on current matters, and votes informedly and regularly on election day. He has "discovered" the wealth of valuable information contained in his farm papers, his books, and in government and state agricultural bulletins.

Let's do a good turn for our neighbor by helping him help himself. Let's pass our old COMFORT along to someone else after we are through with it. The seed may fall upon fertile ground, like the good seed mentioned in the Bible, there to sprout and take root and grow and multiply an hundredfold.

Dry Cows Need Minerals

Though lime and phosphorous are found in comparatively small quantities in feeds, these minerals have a great deal to do with milk production and also play an important part in building up the body of the unborn calf. If the ration fed to dry cows is deficient in these elements, they are then drawn from the supply stored in the cows' bodies. This also takes place during the height of the milking period, but if permitted to continue for more than a very short time, the animal herself is certain to suffer a loss of flesh and physical condition. Likewise, when a dry cow is fed a short or incomplete ration deficient in lime and phosphorus, she becomes run down in flesh and vitality, often giving birth with difficulty to an undernourished calf. Therefore it is a good practice to feed cows well when they are running down in milk yield and when they are dry, thus permitting them to store up in their bodies these elements as well as many others for use when the great demand is made.

The common view is that dry cows need only enough feed for maintenance, but extensive experiments carried on by the various agricultural experiment stations and by the United States Department of Agriculture show that this is far from the truth. In fact a cow is nothing more or less than a milk-manufacturing plant; like any factory, she must have a reserve supply of materials on hand to draw upon when heavy demands are made. A cow that has been well fed when dry has stored up this reserve. She therefore is able to produce more on full feed than a cow that has received only a maintenance ration during the resting period. Short rationing dairy cows during the dry period is false economy—economy that is certain to "back fire." Why? Simply because the elements withdrawn from the underfed body to supply the needs of the calf must be replaced when the cow is "fresh" and placed upon a heavier ration. Therefore she does not "hit her milking stride" until she is once more back in good physical condition. During this period, whether it be long or short, her owner is paying the price for his "economy" in the reduced yield she is able to produce.

In keeping up the necessary lime and phosphorus supply it is well to remember that some feeds are richer than others in these elements. Legume hays are the best and cheapest source of lime; cowpeas, alfalfa, soy bean and the numerous clovers are included under this head, and are listed in the order of their lime richness. Quality of hay has much to do with the amount of lime found therein, good leafy alfalfa hay containing more lime than coarse, stemmy hay.

Phosphorus is derived mainly from wheat bran, cottonseed meal, standard wheat middlings and linseed meal in the order given. Other feeds rich in phosphorus, but less widely known and used for dairy feed, are sesame oil cake, rice polish, buckwheat middlings, rice bran, sunflower-seed cake, rapeseed cake, buckwheat bran and malt sprouts.

No bran or other concentrate contains anywhere near so much lime as the legume hays; no kind of roughage contains so much phosphorus as is found in the concentrates mentioned above. Grass hays, corn silage and all other corn products with the possible exception of those made from the corn germ are low in both lime and phosphorus.

Set New-Laid Eggs

Eggs intended for setting should be set as soon as possible after they are laid if best results are to be expected. In the first place new-laid eggs hatch a little earlier than those that have been kept for some time. Eggs that have been stored, moreover, evaporate to an extent that lessens their vitality, thus reducing the percentage of hatch. Also, if eggs are held for any length of time before setting, there is always the danger that unfavorable influences are at work. For example, if eggs are stored at too low a temperature the resulting chilling is likely to injure their hatching power. If stored at too high a temperature, on the other hand, the embryo is likely to start to develop then stop. When this happens the result is a dead embryo, and such eggs will never hatch.

Eggs set the same day that they are laid usually hatch about eighteen hours earlier than those that have been kept for two weeks prior to setting. As a rule, eggs kept more than two weeks will lose hatching power, though this is not always the case. Tests have been made at various agricultural experiment stations which show that if stored under proper conditions eggs can be kept for a month and still hatch well. But under ordinary farm conditions it is impossible to provide the ideal conditions of temperature and moisture which make long storing possible. Therefore it is far better to set eggs promptly after they are laid, thus insuring a maximum and even hatch.

Care of Pregnant Ewes

Lambing time is the most important season of the year for the shepherd, the "shepherd's harvest," for a successful lambing period is a very fine start for a successful year. A little loss of sleep on the part of the shepherd will save many a lamb and here and there a ewe during lambing time and there is no time that the shepherd will be so well repaid for serving a night shift as during the height of the lambing period.

Successful shepherds point every effort toward securing as high a percentage of strong and healthy lambs as possible, beginning far in advance of lambing time by correctly rationing the ewes. If the ewes are to lamb before going on pasture they should receive some grain about one month before they are due to lamb. This insures a good flow of milk. Oats and wheat bran, either half-and-half or two parts of oats and one of bran, which is lower in price, should be fed. One-half pound a day of this mixture for each ewe is the amount fed with best results.

It is also important that succulent feeds, such as corn silage or roots, should be given to pregnant ewes. These keep the bowels in good condition and serve as general tonics and regulators. The weight of the fleece can also be increased by feeding good succulence. Throughout the winter each ewe should receive from two to two and one-half pounds of succulence daily. After lambing this amount can be increased. Frozen roots or moldy or tainted silage should never be fed to sheep, as such feed is dangerous. Keep barrel salt where it is always easily available, and provide plenty of pure, fresh water. Keep quarters well ventilated and lighted, sanitary and dry if ewes are to come through the winter in the best of condition, and compel them to take exercise by scattering feed outdoors in good weather.

Managing the Herd Boar

The manner in which the herd boar is managed has much to do with his ability to sire pigs that will grow rapidly and feed profitably. Proper feeding is essential, for many good boars have had their breeding power seriously impaired by overfeeding a fattening ration that has made them inactive, fat, slow breeders, and uncertain and unprofitable sires. The herd boar should be well fed but not made fat. This is managed by abundantly feeding a relatively narrow ration containing a high percentage of feeds rich in crude protein. The commonest of these are tankage, oilmeal, fish meal and skim-milk. The correct amount of feed is gauged by the hog's condition as the breeding season progresses. Some laxative feed such as wheat bran should be fed to assure good health. Corn, if fed at all, should be allowed sparingly and combined with a protein concentrate such as tankage.

Confine the boar during the breeding season in a roomy paddock apart from the sows, and bring the latter to him for service. By this plan the herdsman can accurately record service and farrowing dates, and when necessary return sows for re-breeding. It also allows the breeding of a larger number of sows in a single season, as they are removed immediately after service. Handled in this way a mature boar should be able to serve 50 or 60 sows. A specially constructed breeding crate should be used when breeding to an old, large and heavy boar.

During the remainder of the year the boar may be fed a little more corn, but should be given the run of a good pasture of at least a quarter of an acre to insure necessary exercise and to provide the required amount of laxative feed. In

Stable Vices of Horses

"WEAVING" is the name given to the vice or habit some horses have of constantly swinging the head from one side of the stall to the other and, in some cases, rythmically lifting each fore foot in turn. This we consider an evidence of the "call of the wild". The stabled horse is a prisoner longing to get outdoors and see what is going on. Longing for the companionship of his mates or even that of foal or calf. It is the result of prolonged idleness. Some stabled horses learn it by pulling up and down the chain with which they are tied and that passes through a staple or ring and has a weight attached. They like to hear the rattle of the chain. The play becomes a habit. Weaving may also be learned by imitation when a colt is stabled beside a horse that is a confirmed weaver. There is no sure remedy. Stabling the animal in a box-stall may help. Daily work or exercise is most effective. "Cribbing and wind sucking" may also be learned by imitation. It is a vice of idleness. Teething, indigestion, worms, lack of feed and nervousness may also start a horse to cribbing and sucking wind. Some veterinarians do not believe that a horse really sucks wind. Anyhow, the addict animal is always thriftless and shows every symptom of chronic indigestion. Have a colt's teeth attended to periodically by the veterinarian. Keep the animal free from worms. Provide an abundance of nutritious feed. Enforce daily exercise. The vice is incurable when established. It may temporarily cease when the horse is stabled in a box-stall from which everything has been removed on which he could set his teeth or rest his chin to practice the habit. A wide strap should also be buckled fairly tight around the neck just behind the throat-latch. An operation of unnerving is possible, but expensive, not always successful and seldom done. Blanket biting and tearing is best combatted by stabling the horse where covering will be unnecessary. Halter pulling and breaking may be stopped by running a small rope with the halter rope from the ring in the manger, through a ring in the halter, through another in a surcingle and putting a noose at the other end around the root of the tail or around a hind pastern.

SELF-SUCKING COW.—I have a cow that sucks herself several times a day if not watched. I have done everything I have been told to do, and have put several kinds of harness on her and it has been impossible to break her of the habit. I salt her milk regularly and give her plenty of water and salt. H. B. M.

A.—Put an old horse collar upside down on her neck, or put on a cradle of sharpened pickets running lengthwise of the neck. Weave them with smooth wire to keep them in place. Another plan is to hang a pole between the forelegs from a chain running to a halter on the head and another short chain connecting with a surcingle around the body. Putting a straight bar bit in the cow's mouth or inserting a bull ring in her nose and from that hanging another and if necessary a third from the second ring will also stop self-sucking.

CHRONIC SORE.—I have a cow that has a sore in the middle of her back as large over as a cup and several more on her back and hips and from her fore shoulder and rear of her back she has small scabs the size of a pea. She eats heartily. There is an offensive odor from the sore. What is the trouble? MRS. B. R.

A.—Screw worms probably invaded the sores and now they contain dead or diseased tissue which has a bad odor. The cow should be cast and each sore thoroughly curetted (scraped) to remove all diseased tissue; then swab freely with tincture of iodin. Afterwards apply a two per cent. solution of permanganate of potash two or three times daily and then rinse the sores with a mixture of one part each of oxide of zinc, powdered naphthalin and flowers of sulphur and five parts of boric acid.

COLT FOUNDER.—I have a colt that is lame in all her legs. What can I do for her? MRS. A. V.

A.—This form of founder (lammitis) is caused by absorption of poisonous matter in the womb following foaling and retention of a part of the afterbirth or germ infection of the womb. It is incurable. The mare may be able to work on the land if you have her shod with wide-webbed, flat bar shoes put on after covering the soles of the feet with lanolin, oakum and thick leather pads. The shoes should bear only on the frogs, walls and a small rim of sole. After shoeing clip the hair from the hoof-heads of both fore feet and blister them, one at a time, at intervals of two weeks. For the purpose use a mixture of one dram each of powdered cantharides and biniodide of mercury and one and one-half ounces of lard. Rub it for 15 minutes. Tie mare short while blister is acting. Wash the blister off in 48 hours then apply lard daily. Blister the second foot three or four days after the one first treated.

EYE DISEASE.—I have a neighbor, and his horse has an eye that had a little white spot on it for several years. I do not know whether the spot was there at birth or not. Last summer it grew until it covered his eyeball. It was inflamed and it looked as though he would go blind. After a time the spot grew smaller until it was as small as ever. Another neighbor had a horse with the same eye trouble and after repeated attacks he went blind in the affected eye. L. L.

A.—Amaurosis is palsy of the sight also called "glass eye." In that disease both eyes are affected and the pupils are widely dilated and cannot be contracted. There is paralysis of the retina and optic nerves which causes blindness. The eyes have an abnormally bright and sparkling appearance. No white spots are present. In the condition you describe the white spot may be merely a scar caused by an accident, it should be left alone. In periodic ophthalmia (moon blindness) cataract forms and causes permanent blindness. The disease is practically incurable. Cataract is opacity of the crystalline lens of the eye.

EFFECT OF WORMS.—I have a dog, one year old. She gets scared, barks, runs and yelps and acts as though she wanted to hide. The pupils of her eyes enlarge. I am afraid of her when she has a spell and does not seem to know any of us. Some days she will have three or four then she will go three or four days without one. MRS. T. I. C.

A.—Southern dogs seem to be commonly affected with this ailment which is a nervous disorder. We have had many complaints about it of late. In some instances at least it is due to worms and hookworms are most prevalent in the South. Excitement of any kind seems to induce the attacks. To expel or destroy the worms, withhold feed for 24 hours and then give it strong gelatin capsules, one drop of carbon tetrachlorid for each pound of body weight to puppies and two drops per pound to grown dogs. Repeat the treatment in two weeks. Take great care not to break the capsule or let the cap come off. At time of attack give 20 grains of bromide of potash in a little water and repeat the dose in 20 minutes, if needed.

WOOL EATING.—Please tell me the cause of my sheep eating their wool and what will prevent it. W. J. McA.

A.—Ticks or lice often cause such irritation that the affected sheep scratch, bite and pull wool which sometimes is swallowed. In some cases wool that has been soiled or wetted with urine and manure is pulled and eaten on account of its salty taste. All sheep should be dipped to kill ticks and lice before entering winter quarters. Lambs should also be dipped after shearing of their dams as ticks migrate to them at that time. Dust itching skin freely with a mixture of pyrethrum powder, tobacco snuff and flowers of sulphur and repeat as often as seen to be necessary. Keep sheep away from straw stacks, especially barley rye or wheat stacks and from timothy hay. Grain beards and timothy seed heads irritate the skin. So do alfilaria or foxtail grass or needle grass beards.

WARTS ON TEATS.—I have a cow five and one-half years old. Her teats are covered with warts. What is a good remedy for them? S. H. L.

A.—Immerse the teats for five minutes twice daily in a cup of warm water in which a lump of washing soda as large as a walnut has been dissolved. This may suffice but if not quickly effective also cover the teats each evening with a thick paste of equal quantities of salt, flowers of sulphur and cold pressed castor oil. Warts that have slim necks may, if preferred, be snipped off with scissors, a few at a time; then apply tincture of iodin.

LAME CATTLE.—What is the matter with my cows? Their feet are very sore at the top of the hoof. They have been sore since last August. They are from two to nine years old. Can you tell me what to do for them? MRS. L. J. E.

A.—Wading in filth, wet, slush, mud, grit or wiry grass often cause "fouls" or "foul in the foot" sometimes called foot-rot in cattle. Foreign bodies such as corn-stalks, corn-cob sticks, straw, etc., often lodge between the toes and cause or aggravate the condition. Perfectly cleanse the feet and remove lodged objects, but do not draw a rope between the toes as is done by some owners. Cut away all loose or rotten horn of walls or sole of feet, then immerse foot for five minutes in hot water containing two ounces of bluestone per pint. Afterward bind upon the sore parts, by means of a narrow bandage crisscrossed between the toes and then tied around the pastern, some oakum or cotton batting saturated with a five per cent. solution of coal tar disinfectant. Renew the dressing daily until the parts have about healed, then apply pine tar every three or four days. Keep the animals in the stable while under treatment.

When Children Cough Use Musterole

When you are wakened in the dead of night by that warning, croupy cough, get up and get the jar of Musterole.

Rub the clean, white ointment gently over the child's throat and chest, and then go back to bed.

Musterole penetrates the skin with a warming tingle and goes right to the seat of trouble.

Will not blister like the old-fashioned mustard plaster and it is not messy to apply.

Made from pure oil of mustard, Musterole takes the kink out of stiff necks, makes sore throats well, stops croupy coughs and colds.

Sold by druggists everywhere, in jars and tubes, 35c and 65c; hospital size, $3.

sumed his pacings, a smile of ineffable scorn curling his fine lips.

"A poverty-stricken governess, indeed!" he muttered between his teeth; "and I would not have her prospects for future happiness ruined by the son of such a woman! Poor child!" and his face softened into tenderness; "then she has been reduced to that cruel necessity, and she will have a hard time of it if left to the tender mercies of those two. At all events," he continued, "I will manage some way to get acquainted with her before the voyage is ended, and return her cuff button. I shall miss it, too, for it has lain so long in its place that it seems like a precious talisman."

He took from the pocket of his vest as he spoke—that beautiful little trifle of black enamel and gold, with its sparkling initial in the center, inclosed in its brilliant circle.

He turned it over, and read the tiny letters engraved on the back.

"Brownie!" he murmured. "I could not help speaking her name as I held her in my arms; and how beautiful she looked when the lovely color leaped into her face as she heard it. Never mind, when I put this into her own little hands, I will explain it all."

He replaced the button in his pocket, with a deep sigh, and then turned his attention to the steamer, as she cast off her moorngs and began to move out into the mighty deep.

The reader has doubtless recognized in the stranger the person of Adrian Dredmond, one of the young men who stood in the vestibule of the Art Gallery at Philadelphia on the day when Miss Huntington met with such a series of accidents to her elaborate toilet.

He had come from the old country to attend the world's wonderful exposition, and was now returning—but more of him hereafter.

CHAPTER XII.

DRESSING FOR THE OPERA.

The passage proved to be an exceedingly rough one, and Brownie suffered more than any of the party, not being able to leave her stateroom during all the voyage.

Upon their arrival at Liverpool, she was so weak and wan that Mr. Coolidge and Wilbur were obliged to bear her in their arms from the boat to the carriage which was to convey them to their hotel, much to the annoyance and disgust of Isabel and her mother.

Adrian Dredmond had waited in vain for the opportunity he had so desired. He had not once seen Brownie during the voyage. He stood by when they carried her to the carriage, and a feeling of pain smote his heart as he saw her wan face and sunken eyes.

"I cannot give it to her now, but I will seek an opportunity. I will see her again," he breathed to himself.

They lifted her into the carriage, shut the door and drove away.

"Brownie Douglas—the name is as sweet as she looks—good by, my Brownie; we shall meet again," he murmured; and, with a deep tenderness in his heart for her, Adrian Dredmond went his own way.

From Liverpool, the Coolidges, after a few days of rest, went to London, where they proposed establishing their headquarters for three or four months, while they made excursions about the country.

Here they took a house in the neighborhood of Regent's Park, and to Isabel's delight entered at once upon the gayeties of the season.

Brownie's heart is stirred with various emotions as she finds herself thus settled among the very scenes of her aunt's former life.

Here Miss Mehetabel lived when she was a girl; here she was wooed and won; here she had lived that short, bright year, loving and beloved, and which was followed by a lifetime of mourning and sadness.

She wondered if Lord Dunforth were still living, and if it would be her lot while abroad to meet him. She hoped so; and she was confident that she should recognize him, from the picture which was now in her possession, even though so many years had passed, and he was an old man of over sixty.

Of course, she never expected to meet him as an equal, or even speak to him; but she longed for just one look into his face, to see if he had fulfilled the promise of his early manhood, and to assure her that he was the noble, high-minded knight which her little romantic heart had pictured him from Miss Mehetabel's description.

During the first hours of the day Miss Douglas and her pupils dived deep into the mystic lore; and so charming did she make their studies, and so interested did she appear in everything pertaining to their welfare, that, to their credit be it said, they applied themselves with the utmost diligence to their tasks, and soon gave promise of becoming quite proficient.

The afternoons were devoted to sight-seeing and riding, the evenings to receiving company, attending drawing-rooms, the opera or the theater.

One morning Wilbur came home in considerable excitement, and throwing some tickets upon the table, said:

"There, mother, are some tickets for her Majesty's opera, and I want every member of this family to attend, for there are wonderful attractions tonight."

"Then, of course, we must all go, and the girls will be delighted that you remembered them, for they are not often allowed to appear in company, you know," she said, smiling.

"And Miss Douglas, too, mother; I procured a ticket for her," he added.

Mrs. Coolidge demurred at this.

"But Miss Douglas is in deep mourning; it would not be suitable for her to appear with us in her black garments," she said.

Pshaw! she can wear something else for once. It is a shame to debar her from such a luxury; any one can see that she is passionately fond of music, and I should feel mean to take all the others and leave her behind," he returned indignantly.

Mrs. Coolidge thought a moment, and finally assented.

She well knew that too much opposition often whetted passion, and she had no desire to provoke Wilbur into being a champion for the governess, and accordingly gave her consent.

He met Brownie in the hall a few moments afterward, and told her of the arrangement for the evening.

Her face lighted with pleasure.

"Please, if I may be so bold as to make the request, wear something not quite so somber as this," and he just touched the black dress.

Her face grew very sad, and her eyes filled with tears. Miss Douglas had been dead just two months, and the thought of gay attire seemed unsuitable to her.

"Forgive me if I pain you, but I would like to see you for once as bright as the others," the young man added, and then passed on.

She knew her black dress would not be suitable for the opera, and yet she hesitated about changing it for two reasons.

Her own feelings rebelled against it, as if it were doing a wrong to Miss Mehetabel.

"And yet," she said, thinking it over, "I know auntie would not wish me to deprive myself of the pleasure of attending the opera, and I know, also, she would not like me to appear in such a place in black."

The other reason was the fear of displeasing Mrs. Coolidge if she made any change.

But that matter was settled for her by that lady herself. She came to her room during the day, repeating the invitation which Wilbur had given her, and concluded by saying:

"Miss Douglas, have you not something a little more appropriate that you could wear? This black is hardly the thing."

"I have several nice dresses which I used to wear upon such occasions, but I fear they are hardly suitable for my position now," Brownie replied, with heightened color, for the first time alluding to the change in her circumstances.

"Ah!" said the matron, in surprise, and pleased with this evidence of the governess' modesty; then she added, patronizingly: "You have seen better days, I presume?"

"Yes, madam."

"Well, I leave the matter to your own judgment, only do not wear black, nor white, for Alma will wear that. Indeed," she added, after a moment's thought, "if you have a nice dress, Miss Douglas, wear it, for, as we are all going together, I do not care how nicely our party appears."

An amused smile curled her lips at the expression, "if you have a nice dress," and when the door closed after Mrs. Coolidge, she laughed outright.

Evidently she thought if the governess had seen better days, they could not have been very remarkable ones.

She crossed the room, and opened the trunk in which she had packed the richer portion of her clothing, and took out her evening dresses.

The decision was a difficult matter, and it was more than an hour before she could make up her mind which one of those beautiful garments it would do to wear.

She had no desire to outshine Miss Isabel.

But that young lady, with all her love for show and fashion, had nothing more elegant than Brownie's own wardrobe contained.

She at length fixed upon a delicate maize-colored silk, trimmed with puffings of soft illusion, and ruffles of fine thread lace.

When the hour came for dressing, she arrayed herself with a throbbing heart.

She had nearly completed her toilet, when Viola came sweeping in, lovely in blue silk and white tulle.

In her hands she carried a most exquisite bouquet of flowers.

She stood breathless on the threshold as she caught sight of Brownie.

"Miss Douglas," she at length exclaimed, "how perfectly lovely you are!"

"Thank you, Viola; but you are altogether too enthusiastic in your compliments," Brownie returned with a smile.

Yet as she glanced into the mirror, she grew suddenly conscious, and blushed with a sense of her own beauty.

Her hair was drawn away from her broad, low forehead, and knotted gracefully at the back of her small head.

Her beautiful neck gleamed through the misty fichu, and her rounded arms were only half concealed by the fall of delicate lace from her sleeves.

She wore a finely-wrought chain of gold about her neck, from which was suspended the beautiful coral cross, set with brilliants, which her aunt had given her at the same time she gave her the other contents of the casket.

The butterfly hair ornament to match she had fastened in her glossy hair, and it sparkled and gleamed with her every movement.

She surely was lovely, as Viola said.

"I'm afraid your mamma will think me too fine," she said, half regretfully, and struck by the young girl's words.

"But," she added, "this is the simplest thing I have, unless I wear white, and your mamma said Alma was to dress in white."

"Miss Douglas, who—what are you?" Viola asked, an expression of perplexity on her young face.

"My dear, must I repeat my dreadful name? I am Mehetabel Douglas, and a poor governess," Brownie said gayly.

"I know that, of course; but haven't you been a fine lady at some time in your life?" demanded the young girl impatiently.

"That depends altogether upon what you mean by the term 'fine lady,' Viola.

"Why, one who has everything rich and elegant, and who goes among fashionable people."

Brownie smiled at this definition of the term, but she replied gravely and a little sadly:

"My dear, you have been so kind to me, I will gratify you in this, only please remember that I do not care to have it spoken of again. A year ago—yes, and much less—my prospects in life were as bright as your own are now. But death and misfortune took everything from me, and I was obliged to do something for my own support."

"Did you live in an elegant house, and have servants, horses and carriages?"

"Yes."

"Have you always had these things until now?"

"Yes, dear."

"Then you are every bit as good as we are, and it's a shame that you are not treated as an equal," burst from Viola's lips indignantly as she remembered all Isabel's sneers about "the governess," and her mother's scathing remarks about "that person, Miss Douglas."

"Hush, Viola!" Brownie said quietly, yet again smiling at the child's naive remark. "Shall I tell you what my idea of a fine lady is?"

"Yes, do," Viola said eagerly.

"In the first place, it is to be always kind and courteous to everyone; to respect one's self, so that one would never do a mean or cruel act; and never to triumph over or hold one's self above others who may be less fortunate in life."

"That's it! that's it! I only wish mamma and Isabel could hear you. They think they are fine ladies, but, dear Miss Douglas, I'd rather be one after your standard, and I will!" and the impulsive girl threw her arms around Brownie's neck and kissed her heartily.

Brownie was afraid she had made a mistake in speaking thus.

She thought it wise now to change the subject, and asked:

"Where did you get such lovely flowers, dear?"

"Oh, I nearly forgot! Wilbur sent them to you, with his compliments," Viola said apologetically as she gave them to her.

Miss Douglas colored a vivid crimson.

She did not like to take gifts from him, knowing the feelings of Mrs. Coolidge and Isabel; and, at the same time, she did not like to wound him by refusing them.

"They are very beautiful, dear, and it is very kind of your brother to remember me. But there are so many of them, let me fasten this spray in your hair."

She took the loveliest cluster of white moss rosebuds from the bouquet.

"There, see for yourself. Is it not an improvement?" she asked as her deft fingers wove it among Viola's golden braids.

"Thank you," the young girl said, her face beaming with pleasure. "But you have given me the prettiest you had, Miss Douglas," she added regretfully.

"And why shouldn't I, dear? I have not forgotten who was so kind and faithful to a poor, sick, useless little body when we were crossing the ocean," Brownie playfully replied as she kissed the flushed cheek.

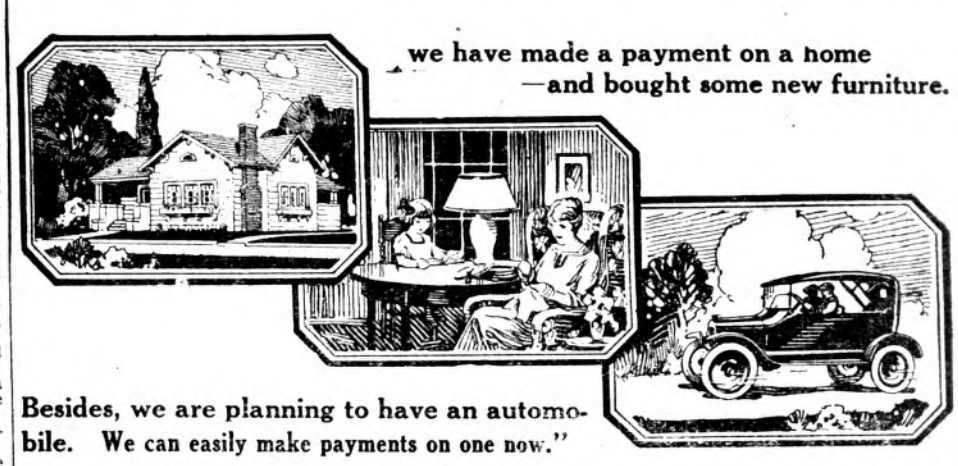
She then selected a few flowers for herself, and telling Viola that she was ready, they both descended to the drawing-room.

A hush of expectation followed their entrance.

Isabel's eagle eye took in at one sweeping glance the simple elegance of the governess' toilet, and her astonishment was plainly visible as she noticed those two almost priceless ornaments which she wore upon her bosom and in her hair.

"Indeed, Miss Douglas, I did not expect to see you quite so radiant," said Mrs. Coolidge in cold tones and wondering where her governess got such elegant jewels.

Brownie blushed deeply, but replied courteously:



"Do I not meet your approbation, madam? If not, any change you may choose to suggest, I will gladly make."

"They'll spoil all her pleasure, the vixens," was Wilbur's inward comment, as his eyes rested upon her wonderful beauty, and gleamed with a stronger ray of love than he had henceforth dared betray.

Mrs. Coolidge knew she had tied her own tongue by what she had said to Brownie in her own

"With This Extra Money —Earned at Home, in Spare Time we have made a payment on a home —and bought some new furniture.

Besides, we are planning to have an automobile. We can easily make payments on one now."

By Mrs. Henry Bender

EVER since the war I had tried to find some home work to do, but with my house and two children to care for, it seemed hard to find any worth-while occupation that I could work at, just in my spare hours, without leaving home.

At last we heard of the Auto Knitter and it appealed to us, as my husband could use it in spare time during the evenings, while I attended to the children.

After a careful study of the Auto Knitter literature we sent for the machine, but I must confess that I was fearful that we had made a mistake—until the machine actually arrived.

Then my apprehensions vanished, for when the box arrived and was opened, the wonderful Auto Knitter looked so neat and business-like, with work already started in it, that we were both eager to start using it.

We spent a couple of hours studying the instruction book, which makes everything very plain. Then we started knitting. When we had finished our first pair of socks there were a few mistakes, but they were ours, not the machine's. Then I made another pair, which were all right.

Mrs. Henry Bender

The first two dozen pairs of socks I made I sent to the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company, and received my wage check by return mail. I was so encouraged, for I knew we need not worry over high prices any longer.

After sending several shipments to the company, my friends started buying socks from me. I received $1.00 a pair for men's socks, and during the Winter I sold many dozen pairs, just to friends and their friends.

Next I started to make ladies' fancy wool hose and children's school stockings. I received $1.50 to $2.00 a pair for the women's and 75 cents for the children's. They were bought as fast as I could make them, so I was kept busy all the time I could spare.

With this extra money, earned at home in spare time, we have made a payment on a home of our own, bought some new furniture, and many other things we couldn't have obtained otherwise.

I know we will make more money next year, as we are now used to the work and like it better every day. We are planning to have a small automobile this Summer to enjoy on Sundays. We can easily make monthly payments on one now, for we have a steady income that we are sure of. There is nothing like Auto Knitting. I can't say enough for the Auto Knitter.

Mrs. Henry Bender.

A Practical Way to Make Money at Home

If you have spare hours, and want to turn them into money, you can follow the example of Mrs. Bender and many, many others—right at home—with the assurance that your work at Auto Knitting will pay you in proportion to the time and care you devote to it.

Auto Knitting is a pleasant home occupation—making Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks on the Auto Knitter. The Auto Knitter Company gives a Five Year Contract to Every Auto Knitter purchaser, binding the company to accept and pay for every pair of socks made in accordance with the simple standard described in the instruction book.

You are at perfect liberty, however, to dispose of your output locally or to private trade—or you may send a portion of your work to us if you choose, as Mrs. Bender has done.

Auto Knitter Workers Sending Over 1,000,000 Pairs of Socks to Us This Year

This year Auto Knitter owners are sending us over 1,000,000 pairs of wool socks for which we pay them in wages alone over $100,000. Later these socks are sent out to over 9,000 stores, where they are sold under the trade name "Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks." Wouldn't you like to have a part of this money we pay Auto Knitter Owners for making them? Whether the time devoted to the work be large or small, Auto Knitting will reward you for the time and effort you put in.

A Wonderful Work Record

Less Than 5% Rejections

The Olde Tyme Socks that are sent to us under the Work Contract come from everywhere—from new workers, who are just beginning their work, and from old friends of long standing. There are socks from novices as well as the experienced, socks from careless as well as painstaking.

And yet, out of the huge total sent in to us, less than 5% have to be laid aside and returned to the worker as not being up to the standard set for Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks.

We believe it to be a great tribute to the general all-round efficiency of the Auto Knitter and the Auto Knitter worker that rejections on this home work, performed in thousands of different homes, are so small as to be almost negligible. If these folks learned from the instruction book to make socks that average less than 5% rejections, can you not do it, too?

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

MRS. W. H. L., North Craolina.—So-called "luminous" or "radium" paint to shine in the dark, is an ordinary commercial product, put out and marketed in various forms. Consult your local paint dealers.

MISS L. H., Bellport, L. I.—A girl beginning training for nursing should have a high school education or its equivalent in general knowledge. Not all hospitals, however, establish educational requirements in their regulations concerning the admittance of "probationers"—as student nurses are called. Write to the Superintendent, Mt. Sinai Hospital, 1 East 100th St., New York City, and ask that a pamphlet regarding the hospital's Training School for Nurses be sent you. You will gain all the information you require from this, and be aided in your procedure should you decide to apply for admittance to the training courses of other hospitals. Your own nearby city of Brooklyn has the big Kings County Hospital to which you might also apply.

R. W., Farrsville, Tex.—The dyeing of furs is not a job which can be successfully accomplished at home by inexperienced hands. We advise that you place your furs in the hands of one of the many firms who do this work.

E. O., Kansas City, Mo.—A diamond is a crystallized form of common carbon. Many efforts have been made to manufacture diamonds artificially, but with little success. Nature's laboratory still holds the record in production. One experimenter after months of labor and the expenditure of some two thousand dollars produced diamond powder worth about one hundred cents. (2) An acetylene cutting torch can be raised to a temperature of 3,500 degrees Fahrenheit and constitutes the most economical method of cutting old metal for scrapping, etc. The highest electric furnace temperature obtainable is about 3,500 degrees Centigrade.

L. B., Simpsons, Va.—Thimbles are thought to have been first used by the Chinese at some very early period unrecorded in history. Thimbles very like those in use today have been found among Roman relics. The introduction of the thimble into Europe is popularly credited to one Nicholas Van Benschoten of Amsterdam, who, in the 17th century, gave to Dutch housewives this aid in the making of their aprons and bonnets.

D. B. H., Maine.—To ask us to tell if you can make money through show card writing or through knitting socks is as if you asked us whether you could make a living, say as a carpenter or a dressmaker. It depends in each instance upon how well you learn to do your work and if you can find a market for your labor after your trade is learned. These are the purely individual questions which count and which you and not we are best in a position to answer. Also how clever you are naturally with your fingers would have some bearing on how well you might succeed at any trade requiring manual dexterity. You know these things and we do not.

H. H., Beloit, Wis.—You live in a good-sized town and you should not have to write across the continent to Maine to find out how you can start in keeping a gasolene station. To us it would seem the most simple thing in the world to ask the head of your local Standard Oil Agency, or even inquire of some dealer in your town who is now in the business of retailing gasolene.

M. M. A., Kannapolis, N. C.—We presume that if you plan to devote your life to home or foreign missions, that this would necessarily be in connection with the church to which you now belong—and which you do not mention. We are therefore left in the dark as to just what branches of work, or of how large scope, may be the missionary efforts of your denomination. We suggest that you talk your ambition and qualifications over with your minister or with some visiting missionary. This would be the first step toward carrying out your hopes.

BROWN- AND BLUE-EYED GIRLS.—You are too young at fifteen and sixteen to begin training for the profession of nursing, but you are not too young to continue your schooling, which your inquiry shows you need, and this additional education will be of value to you if later on you carry out your present wish to become trained nurses.

E. V. F., Detroit, Mich.—You might write us and ask: "Would I make a good ambassador to England and is this a paying job?"—and such an inquiry, foolish though it may sound, would be very much the same as the questions you do send us. We cannot tell if you have the aptitude to learn to letter show cards, or if you have the push and business ability to sell your handiwork after you have learned to accomplish it well. The question of success in life is entirely a personal one. We are sure that Edward Bok or Henry Ford would have made a success of selling show cards or anything else, and that many of the men who fill our relief institutions and prisons would have made failures of this or any other trade. We do not know you nor your ability and cannot properly advise you. The fact that you doubt yourself or your work is not a good sign—or show card.

M. R., Denver, Col.—Probably what was the first experiment in wireless telegraphy was that of Samuel F. B. Morse who, in 1842, sent signals across a Washington, D. C., canal without wires. The distance was but 80 feet in this experiment. In 1882, Prof. Dolbear of Tufts College was awarded a patent for a method of wireless telegraphy operating on the principle of electrostatic induction. However, the real development of what is popularly known as "radio" dates from the discoveries of an Italian, Guglielmo Marconi. In 1896 Mr. Marconi took out a British patent on a system of radiotelegraphy—a definite system based on the sending of signals by means of the radiation of electromagnetic waves. Commencing in 1898, there have been in this country many patents taken out for the improvement and development of the radiotelegraphic discoveries of Marconi. And the end is not yet. Radio offers astounding possibilities.

R. L. A., Eustis, Va.—Although we have to tell you that color bindness usually dates from birth and is regarded as incurable, yet we would not think you need worry too much concerning this minor physical defect. Surely the sky is blue to you and the trees green. Four out of every hundred men are said to have color blindness in a more or less degree. The defect is far less common in women, nature thus allowing them to pick out the colors of their frocks with more assurance. The best that eye specialists can do is to tell us that color blindness is due to some unknown condition of the retina or nerve centers. Color blindness has sometimes been known to develop through disease, or through excessive use of tobacco.

MRS. M. A., Guntersville, Ala.—In the summer of 1609, Samuel de Champlain, the French navigator, discovered Lake Champlain during an expedition in which he accompanied the Algonquin and Huron Indians against their enemies, the Iroquois. The year 1909 was the 300th anniversary of this discovery of Samuel de Champlain, and this is the reason you remember reading so much about Lake Champlain and its discoverer at the time concerning which you write.

C. M. B., Minnesota.—Sir Thomas Button was an English navigator who in the early part of the 17th century became the successor to Hudson in the exploration of the northeastern coast of North America. These discoveries of Button's took place in 1612-13, during which period he was frozen in and wintered on the shores of Hudson Bay. Button, after his return to England, had a series of disputes with the Admiralty which resulted in making his old age unhappy. He died in 1634. Too little is known of the career of this brave man and hardy navigator.

MRS. L. D. C., Las Cruces, N. M.—Pure hydrogen, which is fourteen and one-half times as light as air, is the gas used in modern airships. You could not produce this gas at home nor fill a balloon with it unless you had special apparatus and machinery. The frames of balloons and dirigibles are made from aluminum, but not the gas bags. These last are constructed from several layers of silk cloth interlined with rubber. The whole bag is covered with special varnish to make it more impervious to air.

C. A. J., Star, Ga.—See reply to Mrs. L. D. C., Las Cruces, N. M., in this issue. There is a small but constant leakage of gas in all balloons, and it would be impossible to construct a gas bag that could be once inflated and remain thereafter always with the same lifting capacity. Yes; the famous Zeppelin airships consisted of a cigar-shaped gas bag enclosed in an aluminum framework.

MRS. E. B. McK., Tennessee.—Your Lincoln penny of 1909 is worth no more than its face value. You are mistaken in believing there is any premium offered for coins of this issue.

H. H. R., Alabama.—You can polish this cow horn with ground pumice stone and linseed oil, but if done by hand it will require persistence and hard rubbing.

Z. C., Smithville, Tex.—You should inquire of the officials of your nearest bank concerning the workings of the Federal Farm Loan act.

MRS. F. W. T., Girard, Ala.—Any stories which you hope to sell should be submitted by you to magazines who print fiction of the same type you are producing. Your manuscript should be typewritten and contain your name and address on the upper right-hand corner. Always enclose sufficient postage for return mailing and send your manuscript flat or folded. (2) If you sell a story to a magazine, the purchase of the story gives the magazine the copyright thereto. If for any reason you wish to obtain a copyright on any of your work, you can obtain application blanks and full particulars by applying to the Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C.

Friday for losses,
Saturday no day at all.

As for colors, the rhyme goes:

Married in white, you have chosen all right;
Married in gray, you will go far away;
Married in black, you will wish yourself back;
Married in red, you will wish yourself dead;
Married in green, ashamed to be seen;
Married in blue, he will always be true;
Married in pearl, you will live in a whirl;
Married in yellow, ashamed of your fellow;
Married in brown, you will live out of town;
Married in pink, your spirit will sink.

And here is how to choose your marriage month:

Marry when the year is new,
Always loving, kind and true;
When the February birds do mate,
You may wed, nor dread your fate.
If you marry when March winds blow,
Joy and sorrow both you'll know.
Marry in April when you can,
Joy for maiden and for man.
Marry in the month of May,
You will surely rue the day.
Marry when June roses blow,
Over land and sea you'll go.
They who in July do wed,
Must labor always for their bread.
All who wed in August be,
Many a change are sure to see.
Marry in September's shine,
Your living will be rich and fine.
If in October you do marry,
Love will come but riches tarry.
If you wed in bleak November,
Only joy will come, remember.
When December's snows fall fast,
If you marry, love will last.

"Sally"

Sally was a pretty girl, but in spite of this she was a wall-flower at parties. When the boys were asked why they didn't dance with her, they just said, "Sally doesn't dress like the other girls. When I dance with her, I feel like apologizing for her clothes."

Then, one day, a married sister told her of this. Ten weeks later, at a house dance, Sally was so prettily dressed and so attractive that she danced every dance and received several invitations.

When asked what she had done, Sally astonished her friends by saying, "Why, I made that gown myself. Otherwise, I could not afford to have it. I took up the Franklin Institute system and after 10 weeks' fascinating spare time work, I can now design and make my own gowns, waists, skirts and suits. I am now making an evening dress for mother."

Over 13,000 women and girls have, like Sally, learned Dress Designing and Making at home, and are much better dressed at one-third the former cost. Sign and mail the following coupon—at once. This two cent stamp may save you hundreds of Dollars and make you better dressed than ever.

room, but she inwardly resolved that the same thing should never happen again.

"Your costume is rather rich for your position," she remarked, with well-assumed indifference, "but it is of no consequence for once."

Then, as they left the house, she whispered to her daughter:

"No one need know but that she is a guest."

"It's fine, isn't it, to have your governess outshine your own daughter? I do hope this night's experience will teach you wisdom," grumbled the envious girl.

A Genuine Pimple Remover

How Stuart's Calcium Wafers Work Out to the Skin and Clear it of Pimples, Blackheads, Boils, Muddiness and Such Blemishes.

The manner in which Stuart's Calcium Wafers influence a beautiful complexion is one of nature's marvels. Their first action is to remove the sour fermentations that are apt to poison the blood and thus disfigure the skin. Then the calcium itself is a natural agency to skin health and is appropriated by the tissues for its own particular use in repair work. These effects are visibly noticeable to those troubled with a pimply skin, or one that is muddy or red or blotchy, scaly and rough and coarse. The Calcium Wafers induce a reaction to healthier tendencies and soon the pinkish complexion begins to assert itself, the blemishes fade away, the dimples seem animated and the entire appearance is one of vivacious beauty instead of unsightliness.

Get a 60 cent box of Stuart's Calcium Wafers at the nearest drug store and note the wonderful results. You will surely be delighted.

It contains seven different articles in one, and is especially helpful to people with weak eyes — those who have to use glasses on account of age. If your spectacles have become dim and blurry, you can use this powerful double lens magnifyer to bring out the very finest print in your newspaper or magazine. It will also greatly enlarge the size of your sewing machine needle so you can thread it easily on dark days in dim light. It will give you a sharp, clear view of the smallest objects, such as a splinter in the finger, a cinder in the eye; it also has an opera and field glass telescope attachment to enable you to see the smallest words and pictures at the movies or distinguish livestock out in the pasture at a long distance. This clever little imported novelty also contains a compass to tell your location when out hunting or walking, and it also has a magnifying mirror for a lady's vanity case. Special advertising price 45 cents, by mail, all charges prepaid, while the supply lasts; absolute satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded in full. Send money order or registered letter to S. J. "Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

BLUE EYES, Norfolk, N. Y.—Say to the boy who makes these pleasant remarks of departure: "It has been a delightful evening, hasn't it? I hope we'll have another one like it some time." And of course you can throw in a smile or two and a word of "good by." (2) Do not attempt to give any "wedding breakfast." It would require more form and effort than your simple home wedding would permit, we think. A good plan for a home ceremony is to serve buffet refreshments. That is refreshments which are carried from one or more main tables to the guests who may be seated as they will. Such a buffet menu might suitably include: tomato bouillon, chicken salad, bread and butter sandwiches, coffee, ice cream, and fancy cakes.

JANE OF WEST VIRGINIA.—You say this boy "thought it best to discontinue keeping company until school was out," but you give no reasons why he made this decision, or why he should still be able to keep company with another girl. On the face of what you write, we think your parents are correct in feeling you should break with this young man after such an action on his part. And surely you do not want to try and hang on to him when he has rather obviously dropped you for another girl. Show him you can do some "dropping" too.

E. P., Cottonwood, Tex.—We think there are many things a young man would rather have as a gift than an embroidered towel. Why not some hand-initialed handkerchiefs, a crocheted tie, or a silk muffler? A towel, to our notion, is too much like giving a cake of soap or a tooth-brush.

T. W., Greensboro, N. C.—A "Merry Christmas!" may be answered by the same greeting as heartily given. The same would apply to the greeting of "Happy New Year!" although in this instance one could say: "I wish you the same—and many of them."

C. H., Athens, Tex.—The trouble with gossip is that people, particularly in small communities, love to repeat it and pass it on, often added to and embroidered. You are unfortunate if this girl's enmity is causing her to spread trouble-making untruths about you. You have no defense except to contradict the stories when they reach your ears. As for those who do not believe you when you contradict the falsehoods, why you can safely ignore them, as they cannot be your friends or really wish you well. If your own conduct in your small community continues to be a correct and proper one, we are sure even the unfair-minded gossip-lovers will finally be won over to knowing they have been listening to tales of spite and not of truth. But look out the next time and do not stir up any woman's tongue to tell evil of you.

E. J. H., Texas.—At sixteen you need not worry too much because you find it embarrassing to get up and read in public. You will find that you will outgrow this difficulty. It will help you to fix your eyes on your book and your mind on what you are reading. Forget those who are listening and do not think they are watching you so eagerly. Explain to your teacher how bashful you are about reading in class, and we are sure she can tell you things to help and encourage you. Why, lots of great actors tell us how their knees knocked together the first time they appeared on the stage. You are young, and a few years will cure much.

CAROLINA BROWN EYES.—Candy or cigarettes would be welcome gifts at any time to a soldier in Uncle Sam's army, also a well-equipped sewing-kit, or a pipe and a supply of tobacco. Has this soldier a fountain pen? (2) If your sisters are not at home, and your mother needs aid in preparing supper, it would be quite correct for you to explain this to your caller and ask him to excuse you for a while that you might help in arranging the meal at which he is to be a guest. He will understand this and appreciate your frankness, we are sure.

H. P., Tunnelton, West Va.—Your traveling costume, together with your hat, would be entirely appropriate for your wearing at this hotel where you will be for two days during your wedding trip. You may appear in this way at either breakfast, luncheon or dinner. Your husband will do the ordering for both—you having indicated to him what you wish to eat. A fruit, a cereal, eggs in some form, and rolls and coffee, make up a conventional and full breakfast from which any one course may be dropped, if preferred. For luncheon, select something from the menu under the "entrees." These are ready-prepared dishes of a simple nature. Add to your entree a salad—green or fruit—if you like, and a dessert of some sort may follow, with coffee. For dinner, soup or oysters are well to begin with, followed by any meat and vegetables you prefer. Some frozen dessert makes the best selection to finish the chief meal of the day. In your first visit to a big hotel, watch others. You can learn much in this way.

BLUE EYES OF VIRGINIA.—In your little informal evening party, you may safely do away with supper and serve your guests simple refreshments in your parlor or living-room. Fruit, nuts and candy, such as you mention, together with home-made cake and hot chocolate, ought to form pleasant and really sumptuous "eats" for your little festivity.

C. M., Enfield, Ill.—According to the strict interpretation of etiquette, a girl would receive no gifts but those of candy, flowers or books from a man to whom she was not engaged. So why not give this girl a box of sweets? One of those nice Christmasy packages, tied with a big red bow and with a box covered with holly. And you need no form of words in presenting it. Just hand it over with a smile and a "Merry Christmas!"

E. A. Y., Underwood, N. D.—A surprise party conducted according to rules would be a poor sort of a surprise. No rule but a good time should be the motto for these happy informal frolics. Sometimes many of the refreshments are brought by the "surprisers"—particularly when the party is a large one and the one surprised is thought to be unprepared. Of course the latter helps out from his or her own cellar and pantry. Apples, nuts, cider, cake, doughnuts and coffee—all make suitable jollity-fillers. Natural leaders crop up in an all-host affair like this, and games are suggested and played; dancing takes place to the music of phonograph or piano—and a good time is "had by all" until the stars begin to get pale a little in the winter sky.

M. C., Springbrook, Wis.—Yes; a box of stationery would make a suitable gift for this boy—as well as an encouragement for him to write to you oftener.

L. C., Butler, Ill.—Even if this boy does not seem so fond, why worry so long as he makes his regular Sunday calls? If there is something on his mind he may come out with it, but you will gain nothing by hints or by letting him see you are growing dissatisfied. Treat him as well, or better than ever, and await events. Perhaps it is only his liver or a gumboil. Boys are queer creatures. We know a case where a girl was desperate and thought a boy had ceased to love her, when the real trouble was her swain had begun a mail-order course in radio. He could not broadcast in two ways at once. Many things can temporarily drive love out of a boy's heart—particularly when he has been going with one girl for a year and two months. You have no reason to break with this boy, nor he with you. We are sure it will all turn out right—if he is the right sort and there is no other girl somewhere in the background. These "other girls" make a lot of trouble.

SALLY, Georgia.—Unless particular assistance must be given, because of darkness or difficulty of way, a girl would not take a boy's arm nor would he hold hers. (2) If you think this boy may not have received your letter, you may write him briefly again, suggesting this.

Boys under six years of age average one-third to one inch taller and about one pound heavier than girls of the same age, according to reports of the Children's Bureau.

see what the courts would do with that son, and then I would go away and start over again. There is always a second chance for those that really try. "Humph, she is an old maid or a hen-peck." I beg your pardon, but I am neither. I am young and single, and expect to remain so for some time. At least, I hope my mother-in-law to be will not have to ask some one if I will be a disgrace to her son.

I think COMFORT is a wonderful paper. I enjoy every page of it. I like the Sisters' Corner best, followed a close second by the League of Cousins. I have written to several people, but was never fortunate enough to get an answer. Probably they thought I wasn't worth wasting two cents on, and maybe they were right, but I will have the satisfaction of knowing that Mrs. Wilkinson will read this one.

I am a little over five feet in height, have brown eyes, brown hair, a slightly turned up nose, and am not at all handsome. I am twe—but there, 'm not going to tell you how old I am.

I would be pleased to get letters from any who care to write, young or old, and will do my best to answer.

Love and best wishes to all. BABE.

MINERAL WELLS, BOX 372, TEXAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

Will you please let a Texas girl into your happy circle? I do remember seeing two letters from Mineral Wells, and I know that my letter will be a poor representative of our fair city; but this town is a fine little place and noted for its healing mineral waters, which people from different parts of the United States come to drink, for all kinds of diseases.

I want to ask each for a picture of yourself. I want to make a COMFORT photo album.

I am enclosing a few lines I have copied from an old magazine. I have found that these statements contain much truth.

Ten Things that Bring No Sorrow

1. Doing good to all.
2. Being patient always.
3. Hearing before judging.
4. Thinking before speaking.
5. Holding an angry tongue.
6. Being kind to the troubled.
7. Speaking evil of none.
8. Asking pardons for wrongs.
9. Stopping the ears to a talebearer.
10. Disbelieving ill reports.

Best wishes to all. MAUD MAGEE.

Maud.—You should receive heaps and heaps of pictures for your album if for no other reason than to repay you for the ten very good commandments you sent. If only we could live up to all of them. Let's try.—Ed.

CHICAGO, 3569 CORTLAND ST., ILL.

DEAR EDITOR AND SISTERS OF COMFORT:

More than ten years ago a letter of mine appeared in COMFORT, and through it I found my best and dearest friend—my husband. We have been married nearly seven years and I owe my life's happiness to COMFORT.

Mothers and Fathers, if your children cannot bring their inmost thoughts to you, and depend on your counsel and advice, you have failed in your duty as a parent. The greatest gift you can bestow is confidence! Encourage your children to be frank and to make you their confidant in all they do. This attitude of trust is most precious, and you should do all you can to foster it. How pathetic it is to see parents and children who are guarded and suspicious of one another! A child who comes to you promptly and confesses having done something wrong may deserve punishment, but if you give it the child will not confess next time. A child's confession that calls forth harsh words and severe punishment from mother or father will not be repeated. Instead you will have a sly, secretive child, sneaking both at home and at school at the least scent of danger or reproof. This attitude continues to maturity—

The Huffaker Brooch

By Ruth W. Wesley

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT so happened that Bob Langford arrived at Lookout Terrace when virtually all its guests were either abroad, or asleep, so that only a couple of drowsy bellboys and an old lady engaged in solitaire witnessed his coming. And they immediately forgot it.

One would have said at first glance that the new arrival was close upon thirty, but further observation would have curtailed that estimate by at least five years. The serious, searching gray eyes had a way of smiling suddenly, and taking you quite off guard. They did so now as Langford and the clerk lingered in close conversation over the register.

An onlooker might have wondered at the amount of time consumed by these two in discussing a certain placard, which the clerk had at once handed Langford; but bellboys are beyond surprise, and the old lady was assiduously studying her next move. Besides, whichever way one might turn, he was inevitably confronted by a duplicate of this selfsame placard. In bold, heavy type its message would catch and hold his roaming eyes even as his hesitant foot first crossed the threshold.

$500 Reward!

A reward of five hundred dollars will be paid for the return of wallet bearing name of P. D. Huffaker, and containing, besides two hundred dollars in bills, a gold brooch with ten perfectly matched diamonds set in platinum.

For something like thirty minutes the conversation between clerk and guest continued. Then Langford, having registered, was escorted by a strutting bellboy to the room assigned him.

Now, if there was any one outstanding feature upon which Lookout Terrace was prone to plume itself, that feature was service. Accordingly, in less than five minutes after Langford had taken possession of his new quarters, a maid tapped quietly to inquire whether there was anything further he desired.

"Nothing whatever," declared Langford, lighting a cigarette. His quick glance swept her shapely form, clad in trim costume of black and white, then mounted to the rich auburn braid encircling her head, and rested there admiringly. "That is, nothing but this," he amended. "You might tell me your name. See, I expect to be hanging on for awhile. Snappy climate, and everything." He gazed dreamily toward a sunlit window. "And since I'm to be seeing you every day—" His gray eyes, wandering back, met hers with an engaging smile.

"My name's Katie Cobb." The creamy whiteness of her skin was tinged with a sudden color, which receded just as suddenly.

"Katie!" echoed Langford with approval. "Queer, now, but my only sister is named Katie. She's a pure blonde, though, like me. You have lovely brown eyes, Katie."

This time the maid's poise was unshaken. "If you don't wish anything further—"

"That's all, thank you, Katie." The young man's tone was studiously respectful, and even before her hurried exit the girl caught the metallic click of released baggage locks.

In the days that followed, Katie often came upon Langford in his room. At first she would attempt retreat, but always the young man would assure her that her activities in no way disturbed him. Apparently he preferred the sanctuary of his own apartment to the stir and bustle prevailing outside.

"Listen to this, Katie," he would confide over the top of his book, "the villain has grabbed her by the throat. Hot dog! I'm pretending that the heroine is that crochety Miss Penny, and that I'm the 'heavy'."

Katie would laugh at that. Then her big eyes would darken eloquently as she would fall to recounting the latest exactions on the part of the awful Miss Penny.

Thus, in one way or another, they would discuss the different guests, enjoying together their various idiosyncrasies. And on the third day Langford mentioned the name of Huffaker.

"How many sparklers was it, now, Katie?" he abruptly inquired as she was spreading his bed. "The Huffaker pin, you know. My sister always would hold out for exact figures." He did not look up from his letter writing, but through a mirror which faced him he caught the girl's startled look, as she paused with sheet uplifted.

"There were— Didn't it say ten, sir?"

"Search me. But on the level, Katie, was the pin such a peach, after all?" He turned to face her.

"Was it? I only wish you could have seen it!" Her face took on a radiant glow. "It was the most gorgeous—" Suddenly she stopped.

"I get you, Katie."

Langford resumed his writing. After a moment, "What sort of folks are the Huffakers, Katie? Agreeable?"

"Very indeed. The madam never has much to say. She's dippy about playing solitaire. But the gentleman often stops for a word with me."

"About the theft—I mean loss?" Langford had caught the girl's sharp intake of breath.

She appeared to weigh her words carefully before replying. "Yes, about the—loss. He tells me that the wallet was a gift from his son, who died in France. Keeps the boy's picture out on the dresser all the time. mI' awful sorry about the wallet."

"And its contents, Katie?"

"The Huffakers won't miss the stuff," she answered with a click of her sharp little teeth. "You've said it. Some folks have it all, don't they? Close the door as you go out, will you, Katie? Rheumatism and draughts sorter clash, you know."

On the sixth morning, as Katie entered Langford's room, she found him with head bowed upon the table, and writing material pushed to one side.

"It's these rheumatic twinges, Katie," he explained, looking up mournfully. "Guess I'll have to pull out from here. My sister's going to be awfully cut up, though, at not getting her daily news." He indicated the poorly scrawled beginning of a note, then worked the fingers of his right hand stiffly by way of explanation.

"If you could only tell me what to write," exclaimed Katie with instant sympathy. "Not that I write so plain. But maybe she could make it out."

"Katie, I just knew you were a trump. And this time there's not much to dope out." Rising, Langford courteously motioned the girl to his chair. Then, from the depths of an adjacent rocker, slowly, between puffs of his cigarette, he dictated the following message:

"Dear Katie:

"Here six days now. Room for improvement. Sharp pains in right arm. Tea too strong, probably. Meet Green bill for me on first. Important. Bush can wait.

"Bob."

The girl neatly folded the letter, and at his direction addressed the envelope. But when she was about to seal this, Langford arrested her with a gesture.

"There's a—a little souvenir to be inclosed, Katie. Must have mislaid the darned thing. He looked searchingly about for a moment. "So if you'll just leave the note unsealed—"

Katie met his frank smile levelly.

"Certainly," was all she said. But at the door she paused to look back. And it seemed to Langford that the large dark eyes held more than a hint of veiled amusement.

"Now, I wonder—" he began doubtfully, then gave his head an energetic shake. "No, it couldn't be," he assured himself. He strode to the door and turned the key noiselessly in the lock. Resuming his seat at the table he spread Katie's note before him, and upon a fresh sheet of paper painstakingly transcribed certain of its words. His task completed, he ran his eye through the following lines:

"Meet me Green Bush Tea Room six sharp. Important.

"Katie."

It lacked yet some ten minutes of six that afternoon when Langford, followed by the dignified figure of Huffaker emerged from the winding mountain trail that led down to the Green Bush Tea Room. Though the face of each was tense with expectancy, no words passed between them.

It must have been, then, the sound of their footfall that startled a certain young man who stood in the clearing not far away; for he wheeled sharply about, revealing to their astonished gaze the girl who stood facing him.

"The maid!" ejaculated Huffaker.

"Yes. It's she, all right," acquiesced Langford slowly.

His eyes still held the girl's unblinkingly as he and Huffaker drew near. Indeed, it was with an obvious effort that he pulled himself together and turned to her companion.

"Akers," he whipped out, "I believe that's the moniker at present? You recognize Mr. Huffaker, don't you?"

He paused. But the features of the young man confronting him remained immobile.

"What? Don't tell me you've forgotten him. After that handsome tip he gave you? You waiters are an ungrateful bunch!"

"He—was generous," sullenly conceded the young man addressed, after a moment's hesitation.

"That's the stuff. So you do recall your services at his table? Let me see. His wife was wearing the diamond brooch that evening; wasn't she?"

This time there was no reply. Only a quick narrowing of the eyes gave proof that the ears were alert.

"Oh, well! At any rate, that brings me to the object of our—er, intrusion." Langford smiled suddenly. His gray eyes, alight with mockery, strayed to Katie's, then darkened as the girl instantly averted her face. Recalling himself, he turned abruptly back to her companion.

"Your little game's gone on the blink at last, Akers. I'm Detective Bob Langford. There! I see you've heard of me. I'm flattered. I just want to add, however, that it was Mr. Huffaker's idea, not mine, to make the arrest in the midst of this—this modern Eden." Again the ready smile.

The young fellow who called himself Akers turned toward Huffaker, a half sneer tugging at the grim line of his lips.

"Such courtesy overwhelms me. I am—" But Huffaker cut him short. "I once had a boy of my own," he said huskily, "so I desired to spare you whatever humiliation I could."

Here Katie, brushing the speaker aside, threw herself before Langford, her face strained with emotion. "Let him off this time," she pleaded glancing toward Akers. For his poor mother's sake, give him one more chance. He stole the gems to buy her food. You know, the kind the doctor says she must have. And his arrest would kill her. Anyhow, it's his first job. That ought to help, oughtn't it?" She turned toward Huffaker, with tears barely suppressed. "You wouldn't have him pinched the very first time, would you? It would ruin his whole life. You're not willing to do that, are you? Think of your own boy."

Before the distressed Huffaker could make reply, the young fellow who called himself Akers had jerked something from his pocket.

"There!" he cried dramatically. "They're all there—money, brooch, everything—just as they were when she handed the wallet to me."

As Huffaker seized the extended wallet, his grateful eyes sought Katie's questioningly.

Oil Gauges

OIL gauges of different designs are becoming standard equipment on many of the present day cars. The gauge referred to is the one fitted on the dash in plain sight of the operator, which enables him to know whether or not the motor lubrication system is functioning properly. If the motor has splash lubrication using a pipe line to carry the oil to basins for the main bearings and connecting rods, a gauge fitted with a revolving wheel or just a chamber for catching the lubricant will in all probability be the type of gauge installed. The gauge is frequently referred to as "sight feed" because it really performs the function of permitting the driver to see the oil circulate. The oil is pumped from the main reservoir in the motor through a pipe line to the gauge or "sight feed" on the dash. At this point it passes through the gauge and spins the wheel or fills the chamber provided. The oil then flows through another pipe line from the gauge to the several basins in the motor. Should the gauge on the dash refuse to operate when the motor is running, first determine that there is oil in the motor. Should the indicator on the crank case or oil reservoir show that there is sufficient lubricant make sure that the indicator is not sticking. If the indicator is of the finger type, the hand is liable to become stuck with dirt or gummed lubricant. If necessary, drain off the oil to determine the amount in the motor. On a cold day the oil is apt to thicken to a point where it will not circulate until the temperature of the lubricant is raised.

1. Visible flow with inlet at top and outlet at bottom.
2. Same as No. 1, except that flow is more visible by reason of small disc which revolves.
3. Pressure system using dial which indicates pounds of oil pressure.

Next look over the pipe line leading to the gauge as the line may be broken, kinked or the connection loose or broken.

A gauge indicating the oil circulation in pounds will probably be used in connection with the force feed system. This type of gauge records the back pressure of the oil. The pipe lines described above are used with the exception that the line leading from the gauge is fastened into the main bearings or into a hollow crankshaft. Instead of gradually working into the bearings as does the oil when the splash system is used, the lubricant is forced by pressure into the bearings. Naturally there is considerable resistance to the oil flow causing the back pressure which is recorded by the gauge on the dash. If the pump is operating properly and the gauge does not show the proper pressure, the inspection should be directed for a loose or broken distribution pipe. If the oil should leak out of this pipe, the resistance to the flow of oil would be cut down and of course the gauge would record a lower pressure.

Useful Pointers

Corroded Terminals

Loose or corroded battery terminals will frequently cause sufficient current to flow for lights and ignition but not enough current for the electric starter. In explanation it is necessary to state that only a few amperes will take care of lights and ignition while a much greater amount of current is needed for the starter. Loose or corroded terminals will frequently not permit of such a large amount of current leaving the battery as the resistance is too great to overcome. The terminals should be clean and securely tightened. There are many advocates of coating the terminals with vaseline or just plain grease to prevent corrosion. This should be done, however, immediately after cleaning the terminals.

Uneven Brakes

When the brakes are unevenly adjusted, the car will swerve to the side, the direction of course depending on which side the brake takes hold first. Such a condition produces skids. An easy method of determining whether the brakes are equally adjusted is to jack both rear wheels free from the floor. Have a friend apply the brake pedal a little at a time. While the friend holds the position of the pedal, you turn one rear wheel and then the other. If one wheel locks before the other, the brakes are not properly adjusted and a new setting should be made so that both wheels lock at the same time.

Proper Use of Horn

In this motorized age, the motorist is apt to lose sight of the fact that the pedestrian has certain rights and that he is entitled to consideration. Numerous drivers use the horn as a means to frighten the pedestrian rather than to warn him. I have seen drivers approach within a few feet of a pedestrian on the road at which point he would sound the horn and expect the walker to jump to one side. Besides being anything but a courteous act, the practice is dangerous. All people are not physically and mentally perfect. The person on the road may be deaf, physically incapacitated so that he is unable to act quickly or his mental powers may not function properly. There is no way of determining just what action, if any, the pedestrian will take, and therefore the horn should be used for a warning signal rather than a means to frighten. The horn should be sounded from 100 to 200 feet away, depending on the speed at which the car is being driven. The person signaled is then in position to select a place of safety rather than be compelled to jump to any convenient spot where in wet weather he may get spattered with mud, or should he move to the left, get struck by a car approaching from the opposite direction. Be considerate.

Tire Chains

Adjust the chains so that they do not grip the tires too tightly. A properly adjusted chain will gradually creep around the tire. A chain that is adjusted snugly will not creep and will cause rapid wear at the points where the cross links come in contact with the tire.

Lamp Rims

Some head and spot lamps are fitted with a type of rim which must be twisted so that the lens may be removed. If the lens has not been removed for a long period it is possible for the rim to become rusted in position so that it resists all attempts to remove it by hand pressure. Remove the belt from your trousers and place it around the rim, passing the end through the buckle in the usual manner. Pull the belt tight around the rim, after which a jerk will usually dislodge the most stubborn rim.

A-B-C Signs

Drivers who do not frequent the larger cities are apt to have their curiosity aroused at the following letters which are painted on the pavement at intersections: A-B-C. They are significant of "Always Be Careful."

Combined Braking

The average driver will throw out the clutch when applying the brakes. It is good practice in some cases and necessary if the driver is in the learning stage as otherwise he is apt to stall the motor. However, if the driver has reached the experienced class he can do most of the car braking with the clutch engaged and obtain more efficient braking. For those who have never tried braking the car with the clutch engaged, the driver should first operate his car on high gear with the throttle fully retarded. Take notice of the car speed with the throttle fully retarded. Bear in mind that the car can operate at this idling speed and that the motor will not stall with the brakes applied until the speed of the car is reduced to this point. We will assume that the throttle lever is fully retarded and that the car is being operated at about 25 miles per hour by means of the foot accelerator. You drive into traffic and desire to slow down quickly. Take the foot off the foot accelerator and apply the service brake. The engine immediately acts as a brake and materially assists the service brake in reducing the speed of the car. When the speed of the car is reduced to a point just above the idling speed, determined as suggested above, throw out the clutch as otherwise a still lower reduction in speed would be liable to cause stalling of the engine. As long as the car is not reduced in speed to a point where it will equal or drop below the speed at which the car operates with the throttle lever fully retarded, it is safe to brake with the clutch engaged. When operating on ordinary down grades, it is not necessary to throw out the clutch as a closed throttle and accelerator causes the motor to act as a brake and if not sufficient to check the speed of the car, assistance with the service brake should be all that is needed. After a little practice, the driver will find that his car has more braking power than he ever realized, providing, of course, that he has always done the braking with the clutch thrown out. The advantages of this method are quicker braking action, quicker pick up, less wear on the clutch and gears.

Answers to Correspondents

CUT-OUT, CARBONIZING.—Have had the best cut-out money can buy installed in my 490, 1922 model Chevrolet whch I drive about 27 miles a day on a rural mail route and use the cutout on seven or eight miles of it. How often do you think the carbon ought to be cleaned out of the cylinders? R. E. M., Roanoke, Va.

A.—I cannot but assume that you do not fully understand the purpose of the cut-out. Your letter leads me to believe that you expect the cut-out to reduce the accumulation of carbon in the motor. It will do nothing of the kind as its purpose is foreign to carbon or its cause. When the automobile industry was in its infancy, the mufflers were not so efficient as they are today. Especially was the inability of the muffler to get rid of the exhaust gases noticeable on high speeds. The result was back pressure, which of course impaired the efficiency of the motor. The purpose of the cut-out is to open a gate so that the exhaust ases can pass directly into the atmosphere without going through the muffler. Today, mufflers are much more efficient than was the case years ago and the use of a cut-out is not deemed necessary by the majority of car manufacturers. I know of tests that have proven that the muffler is capable of efficiently handling the exhaust gases for all road work. Many people like to hear the roar of the exhaust and believe that the sound is indicative to greater power but I am certain that if these people could place their cars to actual tests they would fail to find any increase of power.

Regarding the periods at which the carbon should be removed, this matter depends mostly on the grade of oil used. Some oils deposit a greater amount of carbon than others and it is therefore necessary for the operator to keep check on his motor. When you arrive at the time that the motor knocks on grades then you will know that the carbon should be attended to. Knocking on grades is one of the first indications of a large accumulation of carbon.

The backfiring when first starting out is a common complaint for this time of the year. It is due to the carburetor being a trifle lean for a cold motor. If you want to correct the condition, try a trifle richer mixture. However, since you state that the motor runs smoothly after running for a few blocks, I would not recommend touching the carburetor adjustment as you will obtain a much better mileage with the present setting than you would by adjusting richer.

STEERING-WHEEL LOCK, GROUNDING FORD GENERATOR.—I have a new model Ford with starter and generator. (1) Is a steering-wheel lock theft proof? If not, why not? Could not the lock be removed with a wrench or screwdriver in a few minutes? (2) Why does a Ford generator need to be grounded from the terminal when car is used with storage battery out?

C. P. S., Tripp, S. Dak.

A.—Steering wheel locks are considered efficient as their use insures against anyone steering the car. A car that cannot be steered cannot be driven. There are several of these locks on the market and I do not know the particular type in which you are interested. When locked, most of the appliances of this kind cannot be removed by screwdriver or wrench.

The generator must be grounded when the storage battery is removed because it is designed for closed circuit duty. Removing the battery opens the circuit and unless steps are taken to short circuit the generator, or in other words render it inoperative, abnormal voltage would be generated and the windings would burn out.

MOTORCYCLE EQUIPMENT.—(1) Why is not a belt drive as good as a chain drive for a motorcycle? (2) Would you recommend a two- or four-cycle motor where heavy duty is required? (3) Can tire chains be used successfully on a light-weight motorcycle?

N. O. M., Kaycee, Wy.

A.—The belt drive predominated on the earlier types of motorcycles. These were either flat-faced or V-shaped. It is my understanding that the chain drive superceded the belt drive when heavier and more powerful motorcycles were built. The complaint was that the belt drive caused too much slippage. For a light-weight machine, I believe that a V-belt drive would afford satisfaction.

If we are able to judge from the number of machines built, we must arrive at the decision that the four-stroke cycle is by far the most popular.

I do not know of any reason why tire chains cannot be used successfully. I have even seen bicycles fitted with tire chains.

VACUUM FEED UNNECESSARY FOR FORD.—In September COMFORT you explained the vacuum feed system. Please tell me whether or not such an equipment can be used on a 1922 model Ford; also where it can be obtained.

C. P. S., Jane Lew, W. Va.

A.—The vacuum feed for gasolene is standard equipment on the majority of cars. The vacuum system can be purchased from any accessory store. The price is low. Regarding the practicability of installing it on your 1922 Ford, it can be installed on almost any car made. However, the question arises as to the benefit you will derive by installing this system. The tank on your car is under the front seat and is sufficiently elevated to permit the fuel to flow from the tank to the carburetor by gravity. Builders of higher priced cars desired to use the space under the front seat for other purposes such as storage of tools, etc., while others desired to lower the seat to a point where it was impossible to install a tank. The solution of this problem was to suspend the gasolene tank at the rear of the chassis and utilize the vacuum system to insure a flow of fuel to the carburetor. When the tank is suspended at the rear of the chassis, you will understand that the tank is at a lower elevation than the carburetor and that a means of carrying the fuel out of this tank so as to feed the carburetor is essential. Unless you are considering the converting of your car into a racytype, using a low front seat and a tank at the rear of the car, I would not advise your installing the vacuum system, as the results would not warrant the expense.

STORAGE BATTERY IN PLACE OF DRY CELLS.—I have a Case car, model R, made in 1914. It is equipped with low tension Bosh magneto and dry battery of four cells. Can I rearrange this so as to start on a storage battery instead of dry cells? The car is new as it has been in storage since it was made. What kind of carburetor and what make of storage battery would you recommend?

H. T. W., Eckley, Colorado.

A.—I assume that you intend to purchase a storage battery to replace the dry cells for starting. There are a number of storage batteries from which you can make a selection. They all have their good points and it would not be proper on my part to state the name of a particular battery that I might favor. I do not believe that you will experience any difficulty in connecting the storage battery to the same terminals from which you will disconnect the dry cells. If the carburetor that came on the car does not work satisfactorily write the makers for advice as to a change.

HARD STARTING FORD.—We have a 1914 Ford touring car which will not start on magneto at all, and it is next to impossible to start it on battery. We have a six-cell Columbia Hot Shot battery in it but nearly always have to jack up the rear wheels to start it. Have tightened magneto point and put in new wires. All connections are tight and the timer is new and in first-class condition. Car pulls strong on magneto after it is started, and makes 45 miles an hour easily. Engine has been overhauled and as near as mechanic can see is all right. Can you tell us where the trouble lies?

H. B., Crown Point, N. Y.

A.—I am assuming that the hard starting difficulty has been experienced since the coming of cold weather. The installation of the new battery for starting purposes should insure the presence of a hot spark in the cylinders. The jacking of the rear wheel and placing the car in high gear permits the operator to spin the motor over faster. When starting on magneto, this procedure will produce a closer field, providing any play exists. However, a closer field has nothing to do with your case as you use battery for starting. I am of the opinion that you should open up the carburetor for starting and after the motor hits perfectly cut the mixture down.

winter, feed alfalfa or clover hay in connection with the grain ration. At all times keep the boar muscular and active, if you want large litters of healthy pigs—the kind that lift the mortgage.

Eradicating Cockroaches

Roaches, once a pest known mainly in city bakeries and restaurants and on shipboard, have now become a serious problem in many farm kitchens. Their habits are well and unfavorably known to all housewives who have had the misfortune to encounter the "pesky critters" in their kitchens and pantries. Cockroaches collect in dark, damp hiding places around sinks, drain pipes and mopboards where they can live undisturbed. This retiring habit, together with the fact that they are nocturnal, and their ability to scurry rapidly and escape through narrow openings when disturbed, makes it possible for them to become numerous before their presence is discovered.

Only four species of roaches are widely distributed pests in the United States, though several less important varieties are known. The most troublesome varieties are: the German roach or "Croton Bug"; the American roach; the Oriental roach, and the Australian roach. Of these the first is perhaps most widely distributed. The American roach, in company with the other three varieties, is an "undesirable immigrant," having been introduced into this country from Central America.

While the life history of the roaches still is not fully understood by entomologists, it is known that some roaches live for a year or more—a rather long lifetime for an insect. Each female lays several batches of eggs during her lifetime; the eggs are carried around by the mother until almost ready to hatch when they are dropped into some warm, damp, dark place where the young may thrive in safety.

How Roaches Spread

Roaches are great travelers. If for any reason they become dissatisfied with their quarters they will promptly migrate to another dwelling. These migrations usually take place through tunnels, conduits or open sewers in cities, but where such passages are not to be found, a migration above ground takes place during the night. In this manner a building formerly free of the pests may become infested over night, and the same habit also explains the sudden disappearance of roaches from infested quarters. In the country, however, they are usually introduced in packing boxes, in the paper or other wrappings of shipments received from city warehouses, or in old bags or burlap used to wrap nursery stock, machinery parts, or even sugar or other bulk edibles. Once introduced, they thrive and rapidly propagate in their new home. A sure proof of their presence in a dwelling, though they may not yet have been seen, is a certain unpleasant odor which pervades the premises and is very difficult to eliminate.

In attempting to eradicate roaches, it is well to remember that all varieties are general feeders. By this we mean that they will eat raw meats, starchy foods, forgotten fermenting messes in the fruit cellar, or garbage that is not disposed of at once. They are especially attracted to greasy surfaces of kitchen sinks or tables, but are repelled by liberal use of soapsuds and washing powders.

Poisons and Repellents

Among the best roach eradicators, especially for use against the large American roach, is made as follows: Cook three cups of linseed meal with water until it is about the consistency of thin mush. Add to the cooled mixture one cup of molasses (not corn syrup) and one yeast-cake softened in a little water, allowing to stand until fermented, then add two tablespoonfuls of arsenate of lead. Spread around in places where roaches abound—but out of reach of children, cats and dogs—using small tin lids or saucers. This bait works best where roaches have little or no water available. The main objection is that the period of fermentation is short and the bait must be renewed every few days to be effective.

The most satisfactory plan of ridding infested premises of roaches is to use sodium fluoride wherever possible. This is a powder which can be purchased at the drug store, but great care must accompany its use as it is very poisonous. Sodium fluoride should be scattered in and about places frequented by roaches, or, still better, it should be placed in cracks and crevices with an insect powder "puffer"—an inexpensive little tin device fitted with a bellows side and a long spout to be had at any general store.

Where the above poison cannot be used with safety on account of children or pets, powdered borax may be substituted. The effectiveness of this is increased by the addition of one-fourth the amount of fresh pyrethrum. This mixture, as with the above, exerts its effect upon any and all roaches which run through it; therefore it must be left scattered about for long periods of time to be beneficial. In fact patience and perseverance are necessary if these troublesome pests are to be finally and totally eradicated in the household.

How Cabbage Yellows Spread

Cabbage yellows is a disease that is well and unfavorably known in all regions where cabbage is extensively grown commercially, but until more recently it has caused less damage in the kitchen garden. Now, however, its ravages have reached "the last trench" and every step should be taken to prevent damage from this destructive disease.

For a long time cabbage yellows has been known to remain over from year to year in seriously infected soil. Preventive measures consisted mainly in adopting the new resistant strains of cabbage that have been developed to combat the disease. But each year new things are learned. For instance, it has now been found that if large quantities of diseased cabbage are fed to hogs, and the refuse and manure from the hog lots later hauled and spread on fields that are to be planted to cabbage, the disease is almost certain to make its appearance there with dire results. Once introduced into the soil, the one safe plan of procedure is to set out resistant plants, for the contamination is certain to remain in the soil and attack any non-resistant plants that are planted there.

Therefore the use of refuse and manure from the hog lots should never be spread upon truck land where, either this year or later, cabbage is likely to be planted. For the sake of safety, follow either of the courses outlined below: Burn all diseased plants or bury them so deeply that the disease cannot be dug up and spread by the plow. Or, if the damaged heads must be fed to hogs, spread the manure on land that is never used for truck raising.

Apple Trees Need Sunlight

Apple trees need sunlight and lots of it if they are to produce maximum crops of even-sized and well-colored fruit. Experiments conducted in co-operation with commercial orchardists have proved that trees growing in the bright sunlight will produce almost twice as large a crop as those growing in the shade. It has been found also, that the fruit produced on the sunny side of trees is of better quality and color, and considerably larger in quantity, than that grown on the shady side of the same tree.

This information may prove valuable to the farmer who is planning on setting out new orchard trees in the spring, for a few rows of trees set in shady places will cut the returns almost in half throughout the entire bearing life of the orchard. In doing pruning at any time this same point should be kept in mind, and the crowns opened up when possible to admit sunlight. Nor should all the pruning be done on the fruit trees alone. Often we find that a row of large shade trees is located on the east, south or west side of an orchard. These big trees add beauty to the farmstead, we admit, but in addition to robbing the orchard of fertility and moisture, they cast a dense shade far out over the lower orchard trees. This cannot help but have a negative effect on the size and quality of the fruit crop, even though the effects are confined to the fruit trees immediately adjoining. For that reason it is well to cut away some of the large branches on shade trees, and in some cases it is advisable to remove alternate trees and use them for fuel.

Plant Nut Trees

A few nut trees properly located add to the value of the farm even where the land is too high priced to warrant the growing of large woodlots. Along roadsides they are attractive—but the crop may here prove to be a source of annoyance, attracting city autoists who show but little respect for private property, fences, etc. Along lanes, at the edges of pastures, skirting a ravine or stony ledge where crops will not grow, all these are places where nut trees fit in to advantage. We feel certain that somewhere on the farm may be found a little room for walnut, hickory or other trees valuable for their fruit while growing into mature trees valuable for timber.

Nut trees, according to Ohio Experiment Station authorities who have done considerable investigation along this line, are best propagated from seed planted where the trees are to grow. Nuts are gathered in the autumn and stored in layers of sand or soil where they may be subjected to winter temperatures without danger of being stolen by squirrels, rats or other predatory animals. In the spring following they should be planted early before sprouts are formed, then kept from being choked out by weed growth for a couple of years. For best results, they should be set 40 to 60 feet apart.

Though grafting or budding is practiced to a considerable extent by experts and trained horticulturists, for farm purposes good results may be obtained if choice seed is selected from the best samples of hickory or black walnut trees in the neighborhood. Butternut also is favored to a lesser extent, and in warmer regions English walnut, pecan and others are available. In this respect locality is the deciding factor. For safety, however, choose trees that are known to thrive well, then plant them where conditions are suitable, giving them the small amount of care and attention necessary while still young.

Questions and Answers

SANDING CRANBERRY BOGS.—Up here in this region, where cranberries grow wild, we are just waking up to the possibilities of tame cranberries as a crop. Have not started to grow them myself, but some of my neighbors are going into them, and I guess I will do the same if I see it pays. Now, what I want to know is this: Does it pay to sand the bogs? I have read that it is sometimes done to prevent frost. Does it work?

B. C. W., Minnesota.

A.—Sanding cranberry bogs is a practice that is now being followed in Maine and other Eastern States, but particularly in northern Wisconsin, where short growing season and the danger from frosts has greatly hampered the industry. Observations conducted by the United States Weather Bureau and by the Department of Agriculture in the latter region show that sanding has greatly reduced the frost hazard. According to the reports, there is an average of 58 days between the last spring and the first fall frost upon bogs that have not been sanded; sanded bogs, on the other hand, show 118 days between the last spring and the first fall frost. This represents a gain of some 95 per cent. in length of growing season in favor of the sanded as compared to the unsanded bogs. Furthermore, as the need of summer flooding is eliminated, water supplies are conserved; it not only permits but requires deeper and better drainage. Insures against fires in bogs in dry seasons, and permits closer setting of plants, reducing labor and expense of weeding, besides insuring earlier cropping under better conditions on sanded bogs.

FEEDING SWEET POTATOES.—Each year I have a lot of cull sweet potatoes that I cannot sell. What can be done with them? I have been told that they can be fed to cows with good results. Is this the truth? If so, how should they be fed, how much to a feeding, etc.? Is it necessary to cut them up? J. W. P., Alabama.

A.—We have reports of many Southern sweet potato growers who have fed cull potatoes to dairy cows with good results. Culls, however, must not be confused with badly rotted or moldy potatoes, for to feed these may prove harmful to stock. Small potatoes, or those that for any reason do not meet with market requirements, can be utilized for cow feed on farms where there is no silo with good results. Tests show that sweet potatoes contain about one and one-half times the amount of feed value found in corn silage; therefore a smaller amount should be fed, sixteen to twenty pounds per day being sufficient. To prevent choking, cut the potatoes lengthwise. Feed morning and evening in combination with good hay and grain concentrates.

PROPAGATING GRAPES.—I have three old grape-vines that have been bearing for years and years, but they seem to be running out, and I do not feel like spending money for other young vines to take their place. Can I grow new vines from seed from the old ones? Will these vines be good? Or can I make cuttings from the vines and plant these? Please tell me what to do.

MRS. M. J. V., Michigan.

A.—If seed from your old grape-vines is planted it will grow, but the chances are that the fruit will be inferior, and will not be like that of the parent vines. Seedlings, whether of grapes, apples or most any orchard fruit for that matter, will seldom be found worth while except for the new roots to which vines of known variety may be grafted by budding. The simplest way to get new vines from old ones is to follow nature's course. This is done by bending down one or two branches and covering them lightly with earth. In a short time roots will spring from the buried joints and new shoots will appear above ground. When these have become strong it is then time to separate each root by cutting the buried branch, disturbing the new roots and the earth surrounding as little as possible. Set out these new plants where they are to grow, and cut them back from time to time to prevent them from becoming too long and slender. Grape raisers like short, "stocky," strong vines that will make a good growth each year, for it is such vines as this that bear a large and profitable crop. For full details on grape culture write to your Agricultural Experiment Station, East Lansing, Michigan, for free bulletins on grape raising and management.

TIP AND HOPPER BURN CONTROL.—Your article (in November issue) about spraying potatoes interests me. Kindly favor me with definite information as to control of tip burn and hopper burn.

N. C. J., Covington, Ky.

A.—To control tip burn and hopper burn of potatoes, use Bordeaux mixture as follows: Spray the young plants thoroughly when they are about six inches high. Repeat in two weeks in all cases; further spraying two or three times until late July is a safeguard taken by all farmers who spray potatoes on a large scale, particularly in regions where potato bugs (Colorado potato beetles) are a serious pest. The secret of success in spraying potatoes lies in doing the job thoroughly, reaching both the upper and lower sides of the leaves, with a spraying machine that sprays evenly from each nozzle. A fine spray forced into the vines under heavy pressure reaches the leaves and stems; spray mixture poured onto vines from a sprinkling can seldom gives satisfactory results.

To make Bordeaux mixture, proceed as follows: Dissolve four pounds of copper sulphate (bluestone) in a wooden pail by pouring boiling water over it, stirring constantly until completely dissolved. In another wooden pail dissolve five pounds of quicklime in water, stirring until no lumps remain. Never make the mistake of trying to dissolve the bluestone and the quicklime together at the same time in the same pail. When the lime and bluestone have all dissolved, pour each separately through a fine copper sieve (20 meshes to the inch is the right size into a clean wooden barrel. Add one pound of arsenate of lead powder; if the arsenate of lead paste is used, use two pounds, as the latter is only about half as strong as the powder form. Stir thoroughly, then add water to bring the mixture up to 50 gallons. Make Bordeaux mixture fresh each time it is to be used; it becomes weak and less effective as a spray if allowed to stand for any great length of time. Should you need a smaller amount of spray, simply divide the amounts as given to suit your needs, keeping the proportions correct, however.

"We—we were to be married," she vouchsafed chokingly, "just as soon as his mother—as there's a change."

"Open the wallet!" commanded Langford, as Huffaker stood looking with hypnotized commiseration from one culprit to the other.

Huffaker obeyed dumbly. Sure enough, there were the bills, intact. And the brooch! Smiling, he held it off from him in the fading daylight, then suddenly drew it into closer scrutiny.

"In a better light now, Langford—" he began apologetically.

"There!" ejaculated Katie. "Nothing is touched. You wouldn't send him to jail now, would you? Think of your own boy. Give him a chance to make good!"

Huffaker's tone was kindly, almost fatherly, as he turned from the pleading girl to the detective.

"Suppose we drop the case here, Langford. They're both penitent. You can see that. And I've got all my possessions back safe." Beamingly he restored the wallet to an inner pocket. "What do you say, Langford?"

The detective's answer, though meant for Huffaker, was directed toward the still trembling girl.

"It's quite a knockout to my professional pride." He forced a sigh. "However, if you insist—" Hunching his well-set shoulders, and including both offenders in a sweeping glance, he swung jauntily off toward town.

In a moment more Huffaker, having shaken hands warmly with the avowed lovers and wished them happiness, had overtaken the detective.

"Do you know, Langford," he marveled, "they refused to accept a cent!"

The detective gave his companion a sidewise look. "You're a good sport, Mr. Huffaker. And it doesn't surprise me that you fell for their sob lines. But you mustn't get sore when I tell you that they've played you for a bonehead."

At this, the erect figure of Huffaker became even more erect. The action, however, escaped Langford.

"I'll prove to you I'm right," he supplemented. Whipping a revolver from his pocket and pointing it skyward, he had pulled the trigger ere the astounded Huffaker could so much as blink an eye.

The loud report which ensued was answered simultaneously by two others, near at hand.

Huffaker stood transfixed. Langford, laughing, seized him by a shoulder, wheeling him about. "Look!" he commanded.

Almost on the exact spot where but a moment ago he had been released, the man who called himself Akers now sought desperately to fight off a pair of determined captors. Close by, with eyes wide stretched and a small fist doubled back against tightly compressed lips, cowered the girl Katie.

"My assistants, Mr. Huffaker," was the detective's succinct explanation. Followed a loud chuckle as the two thus designated succeeded in subduing their prisoner and slipping the handcuffs upon his wrists.

"Pretty husky specimens, my men," commented Langford pridefully. "I pick them with care. "Well," he concluded with a sigh, "the excitement's over. We may as well move on." He faced once more toward town.

"But the—the diamonds!" stammered Huffaker. "We got them, you know. They're here—safe—every one of them." With fingers that fumbled slightly he touched the pocket by way of confirmation.

"My dear Mr. Huffaker," affirmed the detective, "the fact is, those stones are not your diamonds!"

"Not my—" Incredulity gave way to speechlessness.

Langford bowed his head in verification. "They're merely—substitutes!"

"You mean—"

But the detective cut short the question. "That you've been tricked, Mr. Huffaker. And by one of the slickest crooks on record. 'Substitute King,' we call him. Been hot on his trail for years. Always lands some sort of a girl for catspaw, mind you, only she doesn't get wise to being that till too late. Oh, he's a speedy juggler with his aliases, all right. And when it comes to the getaway, I'll hand it to him, he's an artist. But there! I was about to forget. Just hold on a minute, will you, Mr. Huffaker? Turning, the detective motioned one of his assistants.

The man hurried forward, dropped something into Langford's outstretched hand, then stepped back to his former position.

"Here, sir," said Langford, "are the real stones."

Almost reverently, in the deepening shadows, Huffaker ran his sensitive fingers over the ten perfectly matched diamonds that lay sparkling in the detective's palm, imprisoning in their gleaming facets the last rays of the setting sun. Yet he made no offer to take them.

Into his aggrieved eyes, which now uplifted and met the detective's squarely, conviction gradually crept. But for only answer he spread wide his arms with a gesture of inadequacy, and without further ado fell into step beside Langford. When at length he did speak, it was in a tone of quiet restraint.

"There remains then, I believe, only the little matter of the five hundred reward."

But Langford made no reply. Possibly he did not hear, for already he appeared wrapped in gloomy reflection. Only once more during the return trip did he break his silence. Then, "I wonder—" he muttered, as though thinking aloud, "if we couldn't fix things—somehow—for Katie!"

The Yukon carries more water to the sea than any other river in North America. There is almost continual snow or rainfall in the region drained by it, and during the summer season the snow that falls in winter melts; and this combined with the rainfall of the summer, produces a volume of water scarcely equaled by any other river in the world.

Amaze Your Friends—
Learn Music Quickly At Home

Through This Wonderful New Method You Can Now Learn To Play Your Favorite Instrument in a Few Short Months. Entire Cost Averages a Few Cents a Lesson

"How did you ever do it? Where in the wide world did you ever learn to play so quickly?"

This is the question that thousands of our students have been asked and are being asked daily. With our wonderful easy print and picture lessons for beginners, their progress has been nothing short of astonishing. Not only their friends, but they themselves were amazed at the sudden ability to play or sing. With this accomplishment they have been able to achieve greater popularity than they ever thought possible. And you can do the same.

Even if you don't know the first thing about music, don't know one note from another—with this new method you can easily and quickly learn to sing or to play your favorite musical instrument. And all in your spare time at home—without a teacher.

To those not acquainted with our system this may sound like a pretty strong statement. Yet we stand ready to back up every word of it.

We have taught music to over 300,000 men, women and children in all parts of the world. Just think!—almost a THIRD OF A MILLION GRADUATES. Their thousands of grateful letters to us are more convincing than anything we could say on the true merit of the system.

This method removes all the discouraging drawbacks and entangling hindrances of the old way of learning music. There is no need of joining a class, pinning yourself down to certain hours of practice, paying a dollar or more per lesson to a private teacher.

For Beginners or Advanced Pupils

Piano	Harmony and Composition
Organ	Sight Singing
Violin	Guitar
Drums and Traps	Ukulele
Mandolin	Harp
Clarinet	Cornet
Flute	Piccolo
Saxophone	Trombone
'Cello	Banjo
Hawaiian Steel Guitar	Tenor Banjo
Voice and Speech Culture
Automatic Finger Control

All these obstacles have been eliminated entirely. In their place are delightfully clear, easy and interesting lessons which make every step as simple as A, B, C. You take lessons in the privacy of your own home with no stranger around to embarrass you. Practice whenever it is most convenient for you.

So easy is our method that children only 10 to 12 years old have quickly become accomplished singers and players, as well as men and women 50 to 60 years old—including many who have never before taken a lesson.

And the lessons are just as thorough as they are easy—no "trick" music, no "numbers," no makeshifts of any kind. We teach you the only right way—teach you to play or sing by note.

Think of the pleasure and happiness you can add to your own daily life once you know how to play! Think of the popularity you can gain—for players and singers are always in demand at social gatherings of every kind.

Thousands of our students now play in orchestras, at entertainments, etc. Many have orchestras of their own. Why can't you do the same?

Special Offer

When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of music to mere listening? Why not at least let us send you our free book that tells you all about this method? It shows you how easy it is to turn your wish to play or sing into an actual fact. Just now we are making a special short-time offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now before this special offer is withdrawn. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit. No obligation—simply use the coupon or send your name and address in a letter or on a postcard. Please Write Your Name and Address Very Plainly, so that there will be no difficulty about the booklet reaching you.

lost confidence cannot be regained! Parents who set their little one up before social company and have the innocent consciousness pricked and stung about their personal appearance and behavior—well, may they be forgiven, they know not what they do! Before I was six years old, I had lost confidence in my mother which meant so much to me. My mother would tell everyone that I was an incorrigible child, and I felt the humility and disgrace keenly. Without her fidelity and protection I was defenceless. When I went to school, the children shunned me—I had no chummy playmates, no friends. My mother had put a blemish on my reputation that was hard to erase, and realizing this as I grew older, I went away from home to work, made new acquaintances, and won for myself respect and friendship, but not mother's love. There is nothing much arder than having to fight a battle alone. Make a confidant of your child. Encourage your son and daughter to tell you of their daily life. When they are in trouble, there should not be anyone else to whom they would sooner go. If you would be their best friend, you must have their confidence. Take time to share in their work and play. Unconsciously, a comradeship that will give pleasure to both of you will be formed, and all through life you will be their trusted adviser.

I am an orphan and have no sisters nor brothers. I was born and raised on a farm near Edgewood, Maryland. I have lived in cities since my marriage, but my spirit yearns for the solitude and peace of woods and fields. Last summer I had the pleasure of a trip to the beautiful mountain scenery of Central Colorado via Denver and Colorado Springs, and perhaps I will tell you about it later.

I am sending you a snapshot of myself, Mrs. Wilkinson, and I'll let you guess my age!

I want to tell you how one old man earns money. He stands outside of one of the big stores on North Avenue, and mothers check their babies with him while they do their shopping. He fastens a numbered tag to each carriage, and gives a duplicate tag to the mother. Any one can do the same in a crowded shopping district, and the mother is glad to pay a small fee to have someone watch her baby while she makes her purchases.

With heartiest wishes for continued success and prosperity for COMFORT'S personnel,

Lovingly yours,
MRS. R. E. ROCKSTROH (nee JOOST).

It isn't a bit fair, Renice (that's the name on the picture), to send me a snapshot of yourself and expect me to tell the sisters how old you are. You look about nineteen but as surely as I say that some mathematical sister will pipe up and say, "That can't be, she's been married seven years," and then I'd have to do a lot of explaining and explanations are tiresome. Snapshots can't be reproduced well, else they could decide for themselves.—Ed.

day of the one that was entertaining. We each took twenty-five cents and that was given to the one who had the club to buy herself a birthday present. In doing this no one was really out anything as each one got her money back. For entertainment, though we had a few good musicians, only one would ever respond, so we brought fancy work and talked and visited. Sometimes we sang. At some of the places we would have a candy pull or at others we would play cards, carom or flinch.

We settled the lunch question by having six of the twenty members each bring a certain kind of food. For instance, we have sandwiches, two kinds of salad, jello, cakes, pickles, cream and coffee.

A year ago December our Birthday Club came to an end so we organized a Community Club with an increase of eight members. Now we have eight serve lunch. We are taking a dime each time as a reserve fund for weenie roasts and ice cream, on the river or at ball games, just to have a good time.

We all think the club has done a wonderful lot of good, as it has brought the neighbors close together and makes a better feeling toward everyone. Before we had this club I felt that I didn't know my nearest neighbors, but now I feel that I have sisters for miles around.

At first when the men brought their wives they would leave them and come after them when it was time to go home, but now we have several men folks who say they want to join.

May I come again? MRS. BEN E. WILLIAMS.

LORAIN, 1307 EIGHTH ST., OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have received so many letters in reply to mine, published in COMFORT, that I am answering some of them in this way. I wish to thank each and every one of you for your kindly letters, and in return I'll tell you some of the stunts I have seen tried at parties.

Put as many bottles, small necked, as members, into a tub. Give each person a glass and tell them to fill the bottles with water. The one filling his bottle first wins. Of course a tub filled with bottles must be across the room from place where water is obtained. Prizes awarded could be bottle of perfume for first prize and bottle of ketchup for booby prize.

Fill small bottles with any liquids one happens to have handy. Here are a few we used, vanilla, peppermint, almond, liniments, camphor, perfumes, witch-hazel, etc. Hostess will have to number each bottle and keep track of what is in each one. Give members pencil and paper and let them smell of the bottles and write the name of what it contains. The one guessing the most correctly wins. This may sound easy but after smelling two or three bottles one seems to lose their sense of smell.

Place bowl of peanuts on table, give each person a teaspoon and an empty coffee can. They are to place tin on top of head, not touching it after placing it on head, and take a teaspoonful of peanuts out of bowl, putting them into tin on top of head. The one getting most peanuts in tin within a certain time to win.

Put a base at one end of room, if large enough, and at other end of room line up the players, giving each one a fan (I used pieces of cardboard) and a piece of tissue paper with owner's name written on it. They are to lay the pieces of paper on floor in front of them and at a given signal start to fan papers toward base. On no account must paper be touched with hands. The one reaching the base first wins the race. This is great fun. We laughed so much and bumped heads in our hurry to reach the base first. One lady lost her paper under the dining-room table and she had a hard time getting it out by just fanning it.

Try drawing pigs with eyes blindfolded. The results are amusing.

A COMFORT SISTER. MRS. R. V. LONG.

BONHAM, R. R. 4, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Is there room for another in your corner, from way down in Texas? I enjoy reading the letters the sisters write and have been a silent reader for ten years.

The following is a game I used to enjoy very much. It is a guessing game and the one leading must be informed to carry it out successfully and make more fun too. Stand someone up and pin a slip of paper on his or her back that can be read easily by the others. On this piece of paper write the name of some statesman, poet, traveler or any noted character. The leader answers by Yes or No and the one standing finds out who he is by asking questions, as "Am I a poet?" "Am I a President?" and so on until he can call the name. Then another takes a handkerchief and all stand, one starts and calls out a letter of the alphabet, throwing the handkerchief to one of the players and the player calls out a proper name beginning with that letter. He is supposed to say this name before the one who threw the handkerchief counts three. You can use proper names of any kind. This is instructive as well as a lot of fun.

If any of my old schoolmates remember me as Leona Young I'd be very glad to hear from them.

I am five feet, six inches tall and tip the scales at 120 pounds. Am thirty-one years old and have brown hair and blue eyes and would have a fair complexion if I wore my bonnet. I always like to know how anyone looks.

Best wishes to Mrs. W. and the many COMFORT sisters. MRS. LEONA CHANDLER.

BUSSEY, IOWA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

May I sit in the COMFORT Corner with you? I've enjoyed your letters for so long a time that I feel like paying back.

I wish you could see my roses. I sent in two subscriptions to COMFORT last spring and got a collection of ten tiny rose bushes, two are ramblers, Lady Gay by name, and as I can't remember the name of the one I like best I call it my COMFORT rose and it is a comfort to me. I put it out in April and the last of June it started to bloom and has bloomed every month since and this is November. It has scarlet blossoms and they are fragrant.

It seems to be the custom so I'll tell something about myself and family. I am forty-two years old, have brown hair and eyes and weigh 136 pounds. I have three girls and four boys. The oldest girl, Garnet, 21, was a teacher; she is married. Daisy, 19, is teaching. Verne, 18, and Archie, 16, help their father on the farm. Then there are James, 14, Curtis, 11, and our baby girl, Flossie Foy, three years old and the pet of the family.

I plan various ways to economize. I make the shirts for my husband and boys and can make two for the price of one readymade. I rip up a good fitting shirt when it is worn so it is no longer fit for wear and get a pattern that way. I make it a bit larger to allow for shrinkage.

Sometimes I make a little extra money by selling home-made candy. MRS. JULIA MUSGROVE.

Mrs. Musgrove.—We are glad that you are so pleased with your COMFORT roses. I like mine quite as well.—Ed.

CANISTER, 2 RUSSELL ST., N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am greatly interested in letters from sisters who have children. I have four, three boys and one girl.

FRANCIS DUANE BURDICK.

My youngest is Francis Duane Burdick who is two and one-half years old. I am sending his picture, with his dog. His name is Dimples.

I would like to hear from the sisters and will do my best to answer all letters received.

Good luck to everybody. MRS. L. D. BURDICK.

LOOMIS, WASH.

DEAR SISTER WILKINSON AND ALL THE SISTERS:

I often wonder why so many of you start your letters "Dear Mrs. Wilkinson and Sisters," just as though she wasn't a sister. Don't you think that is rather putting her out in the cold, so to speak?

My reason in writing this letter is because I'm beginning to feel that I'm becoming a parasite, absorbing everything and giving nothing. Most things I've learned have come from the hard school of experience for I was married at the age of sixteen and now at the age of twenty-seven I am the mother of six sturdy youngsters, all, usually, well and happy.

While I'm a long ways from knowing it all, still I feel that I have learned something and would like to pass some of the knowledge on.

If children are allowed to eat plenty of raw carrots they will never be troubled with worms. I cured myself of tapeworm by using them. I ate semi-solid foods for three days, taking an ounce of oil every night and an ounce of Epsom salts every morning. On the fourth day I ate nothing but liquids and in the evening ate a big raw carrot. In the morning more salts and there has been no more trouble from tapeworm.

Corn can be popped very successfully by putting it in a large bread or dripping pan and putting it in a medium hot oven. You'd best make a cover for your pan or it will all pop out.

If your little ones get sick and peevish don't be afraid of the castor oil bottle. It relieves them better than anything else, and be sure to give them enough. A tablespoonful isn't too much for a two-year old. You'll have a little trouble for a moment but I'd rather have that than a sick baby.

In case of accidents with lye, use vinegar at once. My boy was accidentally splashed with strong lye water in the face and eyes and we used vinegar and there was no bad effect.

I have held the floor long enough so good by all.
JUDY.

WEST HAVEN, 116 UNION AVE., CONN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Nothing has ever been said about Mrs. Wilkinson having a goat; but I solemnly declare that she must have one. I've tried my best to enter the precincts of your charmed circle three times in as many years, all to no avail. If my middle name were not Persistence I should have been properly subdued long ago, but as my motto has ever been "Hope for the best and continually work for it," you see I'm trying again. Either Nannie or Billie devoured them before they ever reached her, or else some dear little baby's picture replaced them each time. But I don't mind, for I do love those baby pictures. One picture would be of far more consequence than all my letters put together. Besides, I'm no newcomer. I've been a subscriber and reader of dear old COMFORT for over a dozen years, and expect to go on being one until the end of my life.

In March, 1911, Mrs. Wilkinson kindly published a letter of mine, and if she, and every one of you, only knew the joy and happiness that that letter brought into my life! I could kneel and kiss the hem of Mrs. Wilkinson's garments, as they used to do in old Biblical times when they especially wanted to express deep and profound gratitude. I can never thank her enough—words are inadequate. Two of my most cherished and best beloved earthly treasures came to me through its publication, not to mention numerous beautiful friendships gained through the same means. It brought to me, first of all, one of the truest and best friends that a person could ever possibly have, one who is dearer to me than any flesh-and-blood relation I ever had, and who has proven herself entirely worthy of that statement. I never had a sister but she is all that my heart could desire one to be if I did have. Words cannot say more. And many of you COMFORT sisters know her and love her, too. She had a letter printed in July Sisters' Corner. Know who she is now? Well, for nearly three years I enjoyed corresponding with a num-

Famous Old Recipe for Cough Syrup

Easily and cheaply made at home, but it beats them all for quick results.

housands of housewives have found that they save two-thirds of the money usually spent cough preparations, by using this well-known recipe for making cough syrup. It is simple cheap but it has no equal for prompt re-. It takes right hold of a cough and gives ediate relief, usually stopping an ordinary h in 24 hours or less.

et 2½ ounces of Pinex from any druggist, it into a pint bottle, and add plain granu-l sugar syrup to make a full pint. If you er, use clarified molasses, honey, or corn sy- instead of sugar syrup. Either way, it s good, keeps perfectly, and lasts a family a time.

's truly astonishing how quickly it acts, pene-ng through every air passage of the throat lungs—loosens and raises the phlegm, soothes heals the membranes, and gradually but sure-he annoying throat tickle and dreaded cough ppear entirely. Nothing better for bronchitis, modic croup, hoarseness or bronchial asthma. nex is a special and highly concentrated com-d of genuine Norway pine extract known the d over for its healing effect on membranes. void disappointment by asking your druggist "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions don't accept anything else. ultry Farming for Women

y mixed commercial chick feeds. For the t part, these are of excellent uniform quality, may be depended on to give satisfactory re-s Unless they are unobtainable or excessive-gh priced, the beginner can do no better than se these exclusively, at least during the ding period.

xercise is of vital importance in brooder fed ks. If the weather is pleasant, they should iven access to a small outside yard by the of the first week. Keep the ground covered a very liberal quantity of clean, dry straw. tle scratch feed buried in the straw will keep chicks busy and happy most of the day.

hen the chicks get dumpy and stand round a sure sign that they are being overfed or not getting enough exercise. This is a danger al that cannot be overlooked. To remedy mat-, cut down the feed and increase the depth of litter so that they will have to work harder the small particles of grain.

The Real Cure for Gapes

apes are brought on by the presence of gape-ms in the windpipe of the chick. These para-s, which are small and reddish in color, at-themselves to the wall of the windpipe, thus rfering with normal respiration and causing chick to open its mouth and gasp for breath. y may be removed by snaring with a loop of ehair or fine stiff wire, but if there are many ks the job is almost hopeless.

he real cure lies in ridding the premises of the ction. Where the trouble is widespread, the ks should be removed to fresh, clean ground. old yards should be heavily limed, plowed and ivated, then not used again for at least two ions.

chicks are to be marketed or branded, this uld be done shortly before they are put in the oder.

short spell of warm weather during the early t of the brooding period may cause the chicks eave the hover and sleep in the corners of the oder or in groups about the floor. No harm result from this unless the temperature takes idden drop. In this event, the caretaker must e sure that the youngsters are quickly broken he habit, or they will pile up in an effort to warm and a number will be suffocated.

uch favorite pastimes as picking the toe of e weak chick until it bleeds is a common oc-rence during the first few weeks. This habit generally be stopped by hanging up a piece wo of tough, lean meat for them to work on. earing and eating the felt of the portable er is another habit frequently manifested at age. To overcome it nail a strip of tough loth round the outside of the felt.

A First-Rate Tonic

ne of the best things in the way of a tonic, n the youngsters get off their feed for some cause or another, is a daily feed of sliced onion. Cut the onion in half, and then slice it so that it falls in long, thin strips.

It should be distinctly understood that the onion should be fed as a tonic and not for succulence. Some form of green food should be given daily as a supplement to the grain rations. For this purpose sprouted oats, lettuce leaves, green grass clippings, or shredded vegetables such as cabbage, mangels or beets, is excellent.

Wet sloppy feeds should be avoided. They are in no way suited to the chick's digestive system, and almost always cause trouble when fed freely. In the hands of the expert feeder, moist, crumbly mashes can be used to very good effect in prompting rapid growth. But until one has had considerable experience, the safe plan is to feed by the dry method exclusively.

Such ration accessories as pulverized charcoal, small chick grit and finely ground bone, should be kept in small hoppers where the chicks can help themselves at any time. These materials are cheap, and a small quantity will last a long time. A cigar box divided with two partitions will answer nicely as a hopper while the chicks are small.

The liberal use of milk in some form from the very start is one of the best preventives of bowel trouble and digestive disorders that has ever been discovered. Whether it should be fed sweet or sour is still a matter of dispute among certain authorities.

In practice, unless changed frequently, the milk will be sour most of the time, so the sensible thing is to start with sour skim-milk or buttermilk. It should be supplied in regular stone or galvanized iron drinking fountains that can easily be kept sweet and clean by scalding once a day. When the chicks have had all the milk they want to drink, little or no beef scrap is needed in the ration. After the first week, plenty of fresh water should be provided in addition to the milk.

Correspondence

A. M. J.—Bathe the eyes with a boric acid solution, made by diluting one teaspoonful in half a tumbler of water. Feed plenty of sour milk and green vegetables.

I. L. B.—Such a condition as you describe usually comes from an overfat condition of the bird. You know that when you kill a laying hen you always find a cluster of eggs in formation, much like a bunch of grapes, and called the ovarium. These, however, are but rudimentary eggs, and are in size from a pin's head to the full size yolk of an egg. Each of these eggs is contained within a thin transparent sac and attached by a narrow pipe or stem to the ovary, and during the laying period of the hen these eggs are maturing and keeping up the supply of eggs which she lays. The rudimentary eggs have neither shell nor white, consisting wholly of yolk, on which floats the germ of the future chicken, and as they become larger they arrive at a certain stage where, by their own volition, weight or other cause, they become detached from the bunch and fall into a sort of funnel leading into a sort of passage called the oviduct—this organ in a hen being from 22 to 26 inches long. During the passage of this egg or ovum to the outer world, it becomes coated with successive layers of albumen—the white—which is secreted from the blood vessels of the oviduct in the form of a thick glairy fluid, and is prevented from mixing with the yolk by the membrane or sac which surrounded it before it became detached from the cluster. It is also strengthened by a second and sounder membrane, formed around the first immediately after falling into the funnel, and having what is like two twisted cords of a more dense albuminous character, called by anatomists chalazes, which pass quite near the white at the ends, and being, as it were, embedded therein, thus preventing the yolk and germs rolling about when the egg is moved, and serving to keep the germ so that it may best receive the heat imparted during incubation. It is during the passage of the egg through the lower part of the oviduct that it gets covered with the two skins which are found inside the shell. These, although laying close around the egg, at the thick end, become separate, and form what is called the air bubble or chamber. Eggs are produced from the surplus food, which is that over and above what is required for the sustenance of the hen, and if such is too stimulating, or given in excessive quantities, the result is that in the former case the ova are produced so rapidly that sometimes two of them drop into the oviduct together, which results in the eccentricities which frequently puzzle the poultry keeper. These ova travel along together through the passage and receive the white separately, but become enveloped in one shell, and when laid are commonly known as double yolked eggs, but more properly it is a double egg, the white being duplicated as well as the yolk. Should these yolks be fertilized and the egg hatched, we get the occasional four-legged and other chicken monstrocities. A further result of over stimulating food is varied from the above when the ova mature in excess of one day. In place of falling into the passage in pairs, as above, the two drop separately, but on the same day. This results in soft eggs, not from the want of shell forming material, but rather because the shells cannot be formed as fast as the mature egg is ready for such covering. To over feeding is also attributable the further irregularity of one perfect egg being found within another, and caused by irritation of the oviduct, which, contracting in front of the perfectly formed egg instead of behind it, forces it back until it meets another yolk, when the two join and again become coated with the white and the shell, thus producing another wonder. To the internal fatness of the hen are due other eccentricities than those mentioned, including the apparently paradoxical feat of laying rotten new laid eggs, this being a not infrequent occurrence. The egg, being unable to force its way through the fatty oviduct, is retained two days near the mouth of this organ, and if a fertilized one, the heat of the hen's body tends to putrefy it, and when ultimately laid it is in an addled condition. To other causes, but principally diseased organs, is due a departure from normal in the way of color. A hen which lays white or brown eggs, on rare occasions produces one almost black, and in most instances the shells are rough, wavy, corrugated, or otherwise irregular. Then there are instances of foreign matter being found in eggs, clots of blood being nothing unusual. This is the result of the breaking of a blood vessel internally, and again, possibly the effect of overfeeding. Fowls from whatever cause producing any of the above misshapen or otherwise faulty eggs should at once be killed, for although in some cases a reduced diet may bring them back to their normal production, still the slightest cause will frequently prompt the organs to their previous irregularities.

F. K.—Most decidedly it would be safer to thoroughly clean and disinfect the house before putting your own birds into it. Thoroughly brush walls and ceiling, turn out nests and perches, scrape the floor and burn up any old rubbish that may be lying around. If there is a yard attached, scatter fresh lime around all over it, and after twenty-four hours, plow in. Make a thick limewash, and to every pailful add two ounces of crude carbolic acid and the same quantity of powdered glue, mixed with boiling water and skim-milk, and apply to the walls of the house while still hot.

F. P. D.—Anoint the heads with carbolic vaseline. If confined, give plenty of green vegetable food, and sour milk to drink.

A. A. K.—Write Mr. Gust Toupin, Agricultural Institute, Stillwater, Oklahoma.

I. G.—I fear you have to fight an epidemic of malignant roup, which is a most contagious disease, but as many forms of cold resemble roup so closely as to make it almost impossible to be sure without personal examination, I may be wrong. The one unmistakable symptom of the true malignant roup is the stale, offensive odor which is always present. Open the bird's beak, and if there is no odor on the breath you may be pretty sure it is only a roupy cold they have, which will be comparatively easy to cure if taken in time, but if neglected, the cold is always liable to develop into roup, so it is advisable to treat the birds for that disease without waiting to be sure of the extent of the trouble. Remove the birds that show signs of illness, and confine them in coops in some sheltered outhouse, far removed from the chicken house. Disinfect house, nests, feed and water dishes, as a protection for the rest of the flock. The sick birds should be fed very lightly on nutritious food, and treated as follows: Dissolve half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful of the mixture with four of water, and spray the bird's throat, mouth, nostrils and eyes twice or three times a day for a week or ten days. If the bird is not considerably better at the end of that time, it would be advisable to kill it and burn the carcass. Don't use any of the birds which have been attacked in your breeding pens, no matter how well they may seem to be by spring, for if you do, the chicks are almost sure to be weak and slow to develop, and in many cases show unmistakable signs of rheumatism and kindred ailments.

G. H.—The birds have tuberculosis, which is a chronic and contagious disease characterized by the development of nodules called tubercles in various organs of the body, but most frequently in the liver, spleen and intestines. Tuberculosis is generally brought into the poultry yard with fowls that are purchased from infected flocks or with the eggs of diseased birds that are obtained for the purpose of hatching. If the disease exists in neighboring flocks, the contagion may be carried by small birds or animals passing from one yard to the other. A peculiarity of the tuberculosis of birds is that the liver and intestines are nearly always very severely affected, and that as a consequence the bacilli are very numerous in the intestinal contents and are scattered with the droppings everywhere that the fowls go. The introduction of a single diseased bird may, therefore, cause the infection of the greater part of the flock in a few weeks. In the same way, when wild birds contract the disease, the bacilli are carried and deposited in all the yards which they visit. The eggs of diseased birds frequently contain the bacilli, as has been proven by the inoculation of and the transference of the disease to rabbits and guinea pigs. The young chicks hatched from such infected eggs are diseased when they leave the shell, and, of course, soon infect the poultry with which they run. Moreover, since the sterile incubated eggs are often fed to chickens, it is clear that even the eggs which do not hatch may introduce the contagion unless they are cooked before feeding. Pigs, cats, rats and mice are specially liable to be infected with fowl tuberculosis from eating the carcasses of birds which have died, and these animals serve to keep up the contagion and may communicate it to other fowls. Even calves and colts are sometimes found suffering from this form of tuberculosis. Symptoms are not generally observed in the internal tuberculosis of fowls until the disease has reached an advanced stage of development. They begin with gradual loss of weight, wasting of the muscles, paleness of the comb, and toward the end, dullness, sleepiness and diarrhea. Very often there is at the same time a tubercular inflammation of the joints and of the sheaths of tendons, which is revealed by lameness, swelling of the joints of the legs, and sometimes by the formation of hard, external tumors of considerable size. Occasionally the skin over the swollen joints breaks, the interior of the joint is ulcerated, and a small quantity of pus, containing large numbers of tubercle bacilli, is discharged. Swellings and bony enlargements of the joints with fowls are invariably suspicious, and their nature should always be investigated by killing the fowl and examining the liver and spleen to discover if they have any whitish or yellowsh spots on their surface which when cut into prove to be tubercular masses. There is no treatment that will cure fowls that have been attacked by tuberculosis. When the disease is discovered, the effort should be to eradicate it at once by killing off the whole flock and thoroughly disinfecting the houses and runs. As the great majority of the birds will probably be more or less affected, the chances are that any that are saved will have diseased livers and intestines, from which the bacilli will escape and keep up the infection of the flock and the runs. The danger of this is so great that no attempt should be made to keep any of the fowls that have been exposed to the contagion, no matter how valuable they may be. The bodies of the birds which have died or been killed, as well as all the accumulated manure, sweepings and scrapings of the poultry houses, should be completely destroyed by fire.

ber of very interesting COMFORT friends, besides my "sister" as I always call her. Then a great joy came into my life. That "sister" of mine was the cause of it—and what a debt I owe her!—for I succumbed to the inevitable. She introduced me to a friend of hers. What of that. Well, a good deal of it—he was my "Dream Man." Who says there is no such thing as love at first sight? I'm here to refute that theory. Laugh, if you want to. We have been married nine years and he is still as much my ideal as he ever was. I tell him that he's the "only living one in captivity," as it says on circus billboards. He's my best friend and pal, to say nothing about being one of the dearest husbands—a woman was ever fortunate enough to possess. We are chums always, first and last. Among our friends we are held up as a model of domestic felicity. In this day, age and generation it is considered one of the "Seven Wonders of the World." Didn't Ex-President Grover Cleveland say that his married life was "one grand, sweet song"? Ours is like a beautiful symphony, all exquisite harmony and sweet, sympathetic chords. To be successfully married, a couple must, first of all, be the very best of friends. I know of scores who are not. They pick and nag at each other and continually find fault. I said "find fault," if you know what I mean. They look for 'em. My husband and I are so blind to each other's faults that we wouldn't recognize them if we met them face to face. They simply fade out of our lives, unnoticed. If we were suddenly shipwrecked on a desert island and found ourselves the only human inhabitants upon it, we would be happy and content. We find the greatest pleasure in each other's company and never seem to tire of it. We laugh and talk and read, to ourselves and to each other. Sometimes we just sit and think but always with that underlying current of perfect comradeship. If ever a couple has passed through the fiery furnace of adversity we have but it hasn't soured our dispositions. Rather it has drawn the bond of love tighter than ever, if possible; and brought out of our characters all that was pure and good. Our motto is "Plain living and high thinking."

God bless the Sisters' Corner. Here we may meet on common ground; air our pet theories and receive an intelligent and sympathetic understanding.

I hate to leave you but I must. Will some sister who has had a real COMFORT romance, like mine, please write to our corner.

Come and see me any time. The latch-string is always out and a warm welcome awaits those who care to enter within.

MRS. VENSE W. MCVEY.

UCROSS, WYO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE SISTERS:

How do you do? Perhaps you won't let a Wyomingite in but they really exist and some have good hearts, too. I have been a subscriber many years, and my mother was before me. I always look forward with pleasure to the coming of COMFORT. I say, like one of the sisters a while back, "It's like a warm fire on a cold day," and we have plenty of cold days out here in Wyoming.

How many sisters have children that are ruptured? I have two boys that are and I want to tell you what I did for them. I got a piece of heavy two-inch elastic webbing for a belt around hips and another piece about half an inch wide and four inches long. I sewed a piece of new muslin on both ends of this piece to loop over the hip belt in back and front, having the muslin long enough on front end to not bind when passed under one leg and up to belt in front. I then pin or sew on a small pad made of new muslin. Fill with absorbent cotton to make pad, which should be about two inches long and one and one-half inches wide when finished. This pad I fasten to the belt and leg band after it has been fitted so the pad comes directly over the rupture. This makes an inexpensive truss and a sure one. This is for a small child, make the pad larger for a larger person. My baby was running around and fell onto a rocking chair, causing his rupture, while that of my fourteen-year-old boy was caused by lifting.

I think the sisters who believe in not rocking their babies, cannot enjoy them as much as I enjoy mine. I appreciate my three babies and evenings before I put them to bed we have a romp and a good rock, the three on chair arm, my knees and in my arms. I read clean, wholesome stories to them and sing to them or tell them stories. The older ones, Juanita, four, and Alfred, two, enjoy these stories and even our little girl, Thelma, who is but six months old, looks forward to an evening of play. We have two older boys, Marion L., 17, and J. Potter, 14.

Perhaps you would like to know how I look. Well, I am a dainty little person of 195 pounds, sandy hair, large blue eyes and a pug nose. Yes, that's right, I'm Irish.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters,

MRS. BLANCHE BLISS.

VANCOUVER, R. R. 2, BOX 70, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wish to propose a new discussion. What is your ideal husband? I will tell you mine and see how much of it is your ideal, too.

First of all, a man to be a good husband should be a Christian, no matter what his occupation is. Second, he should be a teetotlar, and have clean personal habits and not use tobacco in any form. Third, he should be a well read man, the man who does not care for good books and magazines does not appeal to me. Fourth, in disposition, he should have humor, a kind, loving and sympathetic nature and not be either too lazy or too ambitious. I mean, there are some men so busy making money that they have no time to help rear their children or to give their wives social attentions. A man should enjoy taking his wife out in public, to church, lectures, to anything that is a diversion to him. A neat man in person and he must be intelligent and wide awake, in short, a live wire. He must not be a fop, nor a cruel-hearted man. A man who will mistreat even a dog is a man I could not love.

I should like my husband to like all the things I like, as much as possible. I believe it is our mutual likes that draw us together. I don't believe in the old saying that opposites attract, unless perhaps in a physical sense. My ideal husband, too, is not too domineering. He is willing to compromise if it is not a matter of principle. He must love children and respect womanhood so much that it is impossible for him to call them "old hens" or say "old lady" of his wife.

Lovers should talk over all affairs of life to see how much they have in common, the more interests in common the less chance for discord. And they should see each other in every-day clothes and be honest in their courtship, concealing nothing that might influence each other's regard. There should not be too much difference in their ages. I think those near the same age are more companionable and a woman wants a man who will never bore her. That is one test of love and love of course is the great essential.

Ever sincerely, RUBY C. NELSON.

Now is your chance, sisters, to tell us about your Ideal Husband. Maybe the one you have isn't your ideal, but tell us just the same. It promises to be interesting and I'm looking forward to the letters.—Ed.

GRESHAM, R. R. A, OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE SISTERS:

The day has been cold, crimson and gold has faded into soft purple and dull grey, and I want to spend the evening with you one and all. I do so enjoy reading your letters that I've joined the Sisters' Corner. I hope you will take me in and that you will all like me and let me help you if I can in any way, for you know, "We pass this way but once," and in passing touch in some way every life in our path. Every morning my prayer is "Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth."

I have three children, an adopted daughter who is fifteen golden summers old, two little boys of our own, one thirteen and the other five, and a dearly loved husband. So you see I am blessed. Personally I am not very big. Have light hair, hazel eyes and fair complexion. I am starting down the trail that leads to the other side of life's big mountain. I am forty-three years old. If you will let me come in I can tuck myself in a very small corner and won't be in the way hardly at all.

There is one thing I want to ask. I wonder how many of you mothers and fathers, men and women unmarried, who have ever given the institution child more than a passing thought. How many really know just what a herding place an institution really is. We have all sorts of "weeks" these days, Baby Weeks, Health Weeks, Club Weeks and goodness knows what not weeks. If one woman out of every five could spend one week trying to find a home for some homeless child, what a glory it would be.

Not very long ago I visited an institution. It was the noon hour and the older children were at dinner while all the little children too young to go to school were having their nap in the then empty schoolroom, their dear little heads lying on the hard desks. At one o'clock they were awakened by the loud clang of a bell and I saw them marching stupidly out of that room, dazed with sleep, but the beds up-stairs were nicely made. That one scene has burned itself into my mind.

Wyoming, the sun-kissed state, is the only one of which I know, personally, as acting like a big loving mother to all her homeless children. Wyoming has no institutions of any kind for her children. The people of that grand big state give homes to the homeless children. Almost every community in the state has children to care for. They do it out of kindness of their hearts They have a home where a dear woman keeps the children a few days until they are taken to the many homes waiting for them. Wyoming does not profit one cent from her homeless children but rather gives of her best. Let every woman, every mother, rise up and say that they will provide a home for one homeless child.

I have three precious children to put to bed, three prayers to hear, so I must say good night.

If in any way I can help any of you I shall be glad. Even at forty-three, I still have the soul of youth, and I would be especially glad to hear from a mother. My own died a number of years ago.

Love to all the sisters.

MRS. ALICE CUTTING PHELPS.

OKLAHOMA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am a wife and mother with three boys, age six, four and two years. I taught school six terms before I was married and during the seven years of my married life had not taught until this year. Times became so awfully hard and crops poor and prices way down until I had to help out on the finances. Some of the sisters seem to think it a disgrace to help earn the living but I don't. When your wheat crop is mortgaged and you get not a cent out of it, but the banker gets it all, what would you live on in the winter? That is our condition right now. My husband is not a trained man in any trade but he is willing to help with the housework and care for the children so do you think it wrong for me to earn $100 a month? We live only a short distance from the schoolhouse and the walk night and morning is good for me.

Now as to the age to send children to school. I prefer a child of seven rather than younger, although I have a little girl at my school this term who is only five but mentally she is a year older. So, parents, ask yourself the question, "Is my child really old enough to understand school work?" I know some children who have been pushed in their studies until they have gotten into water too deep for their age. Maybe you don't know what I mean, but a child might do well to begin with say for two years and be in the third grade by the time he is seven but he cannot grasp the third grade work for it is beyond him. Some won't agree with me but I've had enough experience to know where of I speak.

Some mother asked about teaching the alphabet to a child before starting to school. I think it rests with the child. For my part, I teach them the words and sentences and spell the words to them until they learn the alphabet gradually as they read. My oldest boy has not started to school yet and I have let him learn his letters. I expect some teachers and ex-teachers will say, "She must be a great teacher," but I can say that the children who have started to school to me who knew their alphabet, learned more rapidly than those who did not.

I am five feet six inches tall, have dark brown hair, brown eyes and a rosy complexion. I will not give my weight in pounds but will say that I am a heavyweight.

SCHOOLMA'AM.

NORTHPORT, WASH.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Good morning. I have just finished listening to your pleasant and helpful chat. I haven't much to tell you but I can talk to the sister who wanted ideas on fixing up a boy's room.

I have two boys and two girls and not a very large house. The boys, fourteen and eight years of age, had long wanted a room but we could not give them one to themselves as we had only two bedrooms. But we had a porch running the full length of the house so father and big son boarded up about ten feet off one end of this porch and that gave them a room, eight by ten feet. I helped big son furnish it and little son helped too. First we collected all the paperboard boxes we could find, such as shoe and suit boxes, and tacked them over the wall boards. Then we took the wrapping paper that had been saved from packages and covered the pasteboard. This we papered with dark paper, using light for the ceiling. Big son made a window seat eight feet long and put two shelves under it. This is where they keep their books and games, also their shoes. He also made a table with a cover and in this

Gate Top Mesh Purse

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

WOULD you like to spend a day with me, girls? a make-believe day, I mean. We'll pass over an agonizing hour and a half in the dentist's chair and the washing of the dinner dishes, on to the time when I got comfortably settled in my rocking chair, one foot tucked under me and my writing pad on my knee. Somehow or other my typewriter doesn't seem sociable and friendly enough for our talks together, though I considerately copy my remarks before handing them to the powers that be. But it was an off day; ideas wouldn't come and, really, giving advice is a serious thing. I expect I'm blamed for a lot but I do the best I can, so be merciful. After nibbling my pencil and deciding it didn't taste any better than the rubber dam the dentist used (horrid things!), I said, "I guess I'll go to the movies," which I did, paying thirty-five cents of my own money for a balcony seat. If someone had taken me I'd have sat in the orchestra. But it was worth it. I learned lots of interesting things, such as the psychology of monkeys, how a certain tribe in East Africa lives (I always wondered about them), saw a funny picture about policemen, and Laurette Taylor in "Peg O' My Heart." I don't suppose the winsome Laurette ever reads COMFORT but if she does this will tell her how much I enjoyed her picture. Better see it. There, you know me better, don't you, and like me better, too, I hope, now that you know I'm a regular person and shed tears over the sad or beautifully happy parts and laugh over the funny things in real life as well as in reel life. Almost made a joke then, didn't I? But whether you like me better or not you've got to have your little pills of advice. Get ready for the first pill and if it is bitter remember that the bitterest medicine often does the most good. Open your little bits of mouths!

BILL AND JACK, Wyoming.—I specialize in affairs of the heart, and head, but don't know a thing about astrology, only that the moon makes people do crazy things. Sorry I can't tell you your lucky days, etc. (2) You can send cards after leaving your home town but don't correspond with boys unless you can make yourselves write sensible letters. (Bill and Jack are girls.) Can you do that?

LAWRENCE, North Carolina.—When I read your letter the first time I said, "What's the matter with him anyhow?" and the second time I read it I said, "The boy's got brains, after all." I gather from your letter that while you love this girl of sixteen (or think you do) you feel that it would be better to "quit" her for a while. Good reasoning for a boy of seventeen; most of them want to get married right away and go home to father to live. Of course you don't want to hurt her feelings but I'd advise having a good talk with her and explaining that you are both too young to be engaged, even a teeny bit engaged, but that you want to be good friends until you are older and in a position to care for her. Either or both of you are likely to change your minds and it would simplify matters if there were no engagement.

LOVELORN, West Virginia.—Isn't "thank you" enough for gifts of candy, books and flowers? Do you expect her to let you "cuddle" her in return for the money you've spent on her? Generous, aren't you? I'm glad she didn't let you. Some fellows think that because they give a girl a box of candy they own her. Get that idea out of your head, Lawrence. If there is any bargaining done nowadays the girls set their own valuation and no cheap skate with a box of forty-nine cent chocolates is going to have the right to cuddle them whenever he wants to. A diamond engagement ring is usually the price, or else a wedding ring. Wise girls. A man doesn't appreciate anything he gets too easily. You aren't a man yet, but you are exhibiting the characteristics of the animal, and you might as well get the idea into your head right now that gifts don't make the man.

BILLY BLUE EYES, W. Va.—Do as your parents say, of course. Don't think of marrying a boy of eighteen. He's a mere child yet. You'd probably have to tell him to wash the back of his neck and behind his ears. Do you want a husband like that? Hee-hee! Phony giggle.

PAULINE, Missouri.—There is hope for you if you know you are inclined to be headstrong and have a fiery temper. That's a bad combination unless handled rightly. Learn to control your temper and when tempted to do some headstrong thing say to yourself, 'Pauline, be careful, don't bite off more than you can chew." That isn't an elegant expression by any means but it is forceful, and don't let your willfulness run away with your better judgment—or the better judgment of your praents. Go back to school, but first have your eyes fitted to glasses. We'll talk about running away from home and getting married after you graduate from high school. That will be only three or four years but I'm thinking you'll have better sense then.

BUTTERFLY, Kentucky.—You have tried to make up with him with no results. Forget him and you'll be much happier.

Z. S., West Virginia.—When I see how some of the young girls dress I could wish there were more fathers like yours, though he does go to extremes in his modesty. I'll bet father was a wild 'un when he was young. I don't go in for long trains or woolen stockings myself, but the styles today make me shiver. Knees, no matter how dimpled, should be covered in cold weather, anyway. Don't think to escape supervision of your clothes by getting married. Husbands are sometimes worse in that respect than fathers. I know a man who selects his wife's dresses and hats, choosing just the opposite of what he admires on other women. If you have the opportunity to finish school and fit yourself for teaching, it is worth more to you than being free to choose your clothes, so try and endure father's fashions for a while longer. You have all your life before you in which to dress becomingly, and you may not always have an opportunity for an education.

LONESOME, Oxford, Iowa.—If your brother won't take you to socials and movies with him, let his worst enemy take you, the boy he dislikes the most, provided he isn't a cheap, disreputable sort. When brother objects tell him you'll trade this fellow's company for his.

MARGARET, Missouri.—Next time he says he can't marry you, after having planned to, tell him he certainly can't and that the engagement is broken until he is sure of himself and has a steady job and some money saved. That ought to bring him to a realizing sense of things and, if it doesn't you are better off without him.

T. F., Tennessee.—He may be one of the nicest and best boys in your town but how large is "your town"? There are other boys in other towns doubtless much nicer than he is. I don't believe you care so very much for him, either. There's something about camping parties that make young people think they are in love with each other—I know—when they are not. Just because you can't have him you think you want him when you'd tire of him in no time if he came to see you often. The advice given by your friend is good, for even if it doesn't make him jealous it opens your eyes to the fact that he isn't the only desirable fellow in the world.

LONESOME LOUISIANIAN.—Marriage in itself is all right, it's the participants that make a fizzle of it. Because so many are unhappily married is no sign you would be, but wait until you are older before taking the fatal step. Wait until you are older, and then, if you still feel the same toward each other, you've every chance to be happy. It's up to you to make your own happiness.

BLUE-EYED MARY, Missouri.—"Is it all right to be fast when with a fast boy and slow when with a boy of ambition and principle, because there are so many fast boys and so few nice boys?" Your reasoning is all wrong, Mary. In the first place, if you are fast with the fast boys the nice boys won't want you, and furthermore, if girls refused to have anything at all to do with the fast boys there would be fewer of them. If a boy sees that the slow but nice fellow gets the girls then he is going to slow up a bit himself. If girls would only set a higher standard there would be more decent fellows.

OKLAHOMA TWINS, Okla.—You know you are doing wrong. Stop before it is too late.

V. L., Washington.—Instead of being unhappy and wanting your errant sweetheart back again you should be happy because you learned in time of just what stuff he and your girl chum were made of. Neither of them are worth feeling badly over.

CORA, La.—If you've devoted three years of your life to a man and he hasn't mentioned marriage to you or even told you that he loved you then you must be easy. He should have apologized and explained why he was unable to keep the engagements with you. I don't see how he can think you are "too independent." Look in the mirror and see if you haven't "Welcome" or "Wipe your feet" written all over your back.

A GIRL OF THE WEST, So. Dak.—If you are satisfied with him then there is nothing more to be said. You've got to live with him, but it seems to me that if I'd responsibilities and cares ever since I was a mere child 'd want to get something more out of life than marrying a widower twice my age, with one child. However, thrills do not always mean happiness.

BROWN EYES, Kansas.—Most certainly you should invite the girl who is visiting you into the room when you are entertaining your fiance. You may be taking a chance in so doing, but she is your guest and as such is entitled to every courtesy. If she is at all tactful she will murmur something about having letters to write and leave you to yourselves a while. (2) The only way I know of declining an invitation is to say you are sorry but because of this or that you are unable to accept.

See you later—next month. Be good children.

table is kept their writing and drawing materials. And then comes the chiffonier. If you have boys be sure and have a chiffonier for them. We got ours at a second-hand store for three dollars, and each boy has two large drawers for clothing and a small drawer for stockings and handkerchiefs. I had a set of good springs but no bed so we made a couchlike frame for the spring. I took a heavy piece of unbleached cotton and outlined on it, around the edge, pictures of animals, and in the center a picture of a boy on horseback. I made several cushions out of flour sacks and two out of silk scraps. The window seat is covered with cretonne with a ruffle reaching to the floor. The table and chiffonier have scarves of unbleached muslin trimmed with cretonne. They have a framed picture and a postcard rack on the wall, a lamp and two small rocking chairs. The building and furnishing of the room cost us next to nothing but it gives the boys untold pleasure. We will have to fix up some kind of a stove for this winter as big son spends part of his evenings there drawing or cutting out things for his scrap-books.

With best wishes to all, ANNIE LAURIE.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

When traveling in a sleeper, a clothes hanger can be made by tightly rolling a newspaper, and tying string in the center, leaving a loop by which to hang it. Pin this to the curtain and you have a very good hanger. With a supply of safety-pins, the curtain can be brought into good service and made to hold most of your clothes.—GRACE WEATHERFORD, Viola, Ark.

Use odd pieces of wall paper for ceiling by turning the wrong side out. Most wall papers are cream color on the back and several different patterns could be used in this way.

Gilt frames can be restored by rubbing them with a sponge moistened in turpentine.

TO CLEAN A CORSET.—Make ready a hot solution containing a tablespoonful each of ammonia, borax and washing soda, to two gallons of water. Soap a small, stiff brush well and dip in coarse oatmeal. Scrub the corset thoroughly until all the stains are removed, rinse well in hot and then cold water and hang in sun to dry. —MURIEL GARRISON, Wayne City, Ill.

When putting summer clothes away for the winter wash and blue them thoroughly, especially the white goods, and they will not be yellow in the spring. Use no starch as that rots the goods.

When putting vegetables such as carrots and beets away for winter use, pack in sand and they will keep better.—MAMIE LILLIE, Brownsdale, Minn.

An easy and effective way of removing the letters from flour sacks is to wet the sack and soap the letters thoroughly, then sprinkle with baking soda and roll tightly and let remain for two or three hours. The letters will then wash out easily. This must be done before the sacks have ever been washed.—MRS. J. D. LAEL, Barry, Wash.

If your wire milk strainer gets clogged rub it briskly, when dry, with dry salt and it will be as good as new.

Take a large baking powder can, punch holes in cover with nail. Fill can with flour, salt and pepper, in desired proportions, and you will have a flour dredge always ready at hand.

Scratches on fumed oak furniture can be hidden by an application of iodin.

To make sterilized home-made bandages, tear a clean old sheet into strips one inch wide, or as wide as desired, roll these strips and put them into a fruit jar and screw the lid on, suspend the jar in water and allow to boil one hour. This way you have sterilized bandages just as good as any you could buy at much less cost. Always remove bandages with sterilized forceps or tweezers, never with your fingers unless they are surgically clean.—LAURA CARTER, Dayton, Wash.

To clean a clock, take a piece of cotton the size of a hen's egg and soak in kerosene, then place on bottom of clock. After three or four days look inside and you will find the cotton black with dust. The fumes of the oil will loosen the particles of dust and thus clean the clock.

To remove oil paint or varnish, apply a mixture of about five parts of water-glass, one part of soda lye and one part ammonia. When dry the paint or varnish may be rubbed off.

To clean furs, warm a quantity of new bran in a pan.

Stop Pyorrhea

Save Your Teeth Before It Is Too Late

"AMOSOL"—The New Scientific Discovery kills Pyorrhea germs and heals gums quickly. Sold under a guarantee. Sore or bleeding gums and loose teeth are sure signs of dangerous Pyorrhea and lead to loss of teeth, Rheumatism, Kidney trouble and Neuritis. Don't let it go until it is too late. Take it in hand at once before the poisonous pus has had a chance to carry some perilous disease into your system.

Read What Users Say About Amosol

Better Than Dentist's Treatment

"I am very much pleased with the results of my first bottle of Amosol and I am sending this order for two more bottles. I had my gums treated by my dentist last year for a month. He treated them twice a week at a dollar a treatment and didn't do them as much good as half a bottle of Amosol. I am telling my friends about Amosol and what it will do.
MRS. L. M. LEWIS"

Amosol a God-Send

"My first bottle of Amosol is all gone and I am sure it has helped me very much. My gums are better and teeth tighter. I think it is a God-send to Pyorrhea Sufferers, and I'll recommend it to all.
MRS. EDMOND COX, Tupelo, Miss."

Dentist Glad to Get Amosol

"I had just been to the dentist before Amosol arrived. The dentist said I had pus pockets under my teeth. I have used Amosol only six days and there is a great difference. My dentist is delighted to get such a good and easy treatment for the teeth.
GRACE PIELRASEH, Turner Falls, Mass."

54 Inch Rope Of Pearls

Reward No. 9882

Full Opera Length

THE dream of every woman and girl is to possess her own necklace of gleaming, iridescent pearls. There's a wonderful fascination about them—a beauty that appeals to every feminine heart.

Now your dream can come true—for we are giving away this handsome, full opera length rope of Parisian pearls. It is 54 inches long, all the pearls are of uniform size—¼ inch in diameter—of perfect finish and luster, far handsomer than the ordinary imitation pearl necklace sold at a high price. It can easily be wound twice around the neck, making the double rope as shown in our illustration.

By rare good luck we secured first choice of these necklaces from a large importer and at a price that enables us to give them for an unusually small club. Please read the following offer and learn how you can get a beautiful, 54-inch rope of pearls free of all cost.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this handsome, opera length Pearl Necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9882.

Shaggy Teddy Bear

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and here is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" is a plump, shaggy fellow, 10 inches tall, made of brown plush, carefully stitched and finished, and his head and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit down, stand on his head, walk on all fours, in fact he gets himself into all kinds of positions, so comical and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. Teddy is so well made that he cannot easily become broken, and with ordinary care should last for years. We will send you Teddy free if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Teddy Bear free and prepaid. Reward No. 9992.

Writing And Drawing Outfit

Reward No. 9972

For Home And School

HERE is something that is needed in every home and by every schoolboy and schoolgirl—a big value-assortment of almost everything needed for writing and drawing. Our illustration is, of course, greatly reduced in size. The Case, which is made of fine leatherette, is 10½ inches long and 2½ inches wide. It is of the folding style, with a snap fastener, so that it can conveniently be carried in the pocket or in the children's lunch basket. Inside the Case there are three high-grade pencils with erasers, one good quality penholder with pen, one twin pencil (in reality two pencils in a combination holder), one pencil sharpener, one large rubber eraser, one 10-inch ruler and an aluminum collapsible drinking cup with cover.

This Outfit is manufactured by the American Lead Pencil Company, which is sufficient guarantee of its fine quality, and we know that it will please our readers, especially those who have children going to school, and of course it is just as handy in the home, because all the pencils, penholder, etc., are high grade and just what grown people like to use. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these fine Outfits free.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this complete Writing and Drawing Outfit, exactly as above described, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9972.

Beautify Your Home With These Magnificent Ever-Blooming Roses!

THERE'S no place like home—and no home as beautiful in summer as when surrounded with fragrant, luxuriously blooming roses. Why not plant some around your home this spring? Even if you now have a garden, you can find room for the five splendid bushes offered here—and they will cost you nothing. We buy these roses from the largest rose growers in the world. They are the finest that can be obtained. There are five different varieties in the assortment and each is absolutely the prize of its class, producing every month in the season an amazing profusion of large, magnificent blossoms, delightful in fragrance and of the most radiant colors. The bushes are one year old, strong, healthy, with well-formed roots. No matter where you live you will receive them at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five varieties given you on this offer. And please remember that with the bushes we are also going to send you complete directions for their planting and culture.

You Get One Each Of These Five Prize Beauties!

Mrs. Charles Bell One of the most beautiful and fragrant shell-pink roses ever introduced. It is a strong, vigorous grower and one of the hardiest of all bloomers. The flowers are faultlessly formed, extra large and double, and the abundance of bloom produced in one season is simply astounding.

Etoile De Lyon This magnificent bright sulphur-yellow rose is a fine forcer and an ideal variety both for cutting and garden purposes, being an exceptionally vigorous grower and prolific bloomer, bearing its flowers on strong, erect stems well covered with dark, glossy foliage.

W. C. Gaunt A rose of unusual individuality. Its color is a brilliant, velvety vermillion tipped with scarlet. The buds are medium long and pointed, the stems rigid, habit branching, with large, oval beech-green foliage. The fragrance of this rose is like tea and it is a rapid, vigorous grower.

Climbing Helen Gould There is probably no red rose so popular as the beautiful Helen Gould. It is now introduced for the first time in climbing form. Everybody is familiar with the warm watermelon-red color of its charming flowers. This is a grand climber, having none of the defects of the older varieties.

Snowflake A crowning masterpiece, with hardy, vigorous constitution, growing to perfection in almost any soil or situation. It has the most magnificent foliage and is a continuous bloomer of medium-size flowers, the beauty of which is nothing short of superb. Its color is pure white.

Our Free Offer For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you the above described five rose bushes (one each of the five varieties) free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8661. They will be mailed to you at the proper time for planting in your locality.

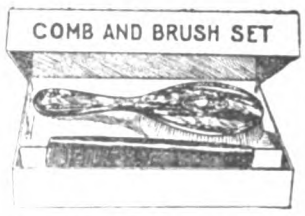
This Beautiful Crystal Necklace

Topaz
Amethyst
Emerald
Sapphire

For A Club Of Only Two!



RIGHT from New York, the center of fashion, comes this new, stylish necklace and we were indeed fortunate in obtaining a good supply of actual colors because mere words fail to do it justice. It is thirty inches long, composed of brilliant crystal cut beads, alternating with seed beads, with transparent long oval and round bead ornamentations and tassel. It comes in four different colors—Topaz, Amethyst, Emerald and Sapphire.

City people of course have no difficulty in obtaining the newest styles in necklaces. But COMFORT'S women and girl readers live in the country, far from the up-to-date stores—and that's why we make this offer. This is your opportunity to secure a necklace as handsome and stylish as any that will be seen anywhere this season. And best of all, it will not cost you one cent if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this beautiful crystal bead necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 1142.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

2-Piece Toilet Set

THIS is a good grade Toilet Set, consisting of comb and brush. The comb is seven inches long, with coarse and fine teeth, and comes in the new popular "Malachite" green finish. The brush is nine inches long, two and a half inches wide, with firm white bristles, and is finished in the same beautiful "Malachite" green, with a silverine shield on the back. We have given away thousands of these sets and it never fails to please.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Comb and Brush Set free and prepaid. Reward No. 9982.

French Ivory Manicure Set

In A Roll-Up Leather Case

Given For A Club Of Four!

A PRACTICAL and beautiful Set, containing everything necessary for the proper care of the nails. It consists of a 5-inch flexible polished steel nail file, a pair of 3½-inch polished steel curved nail scissors, a 4-inch cuticle knife with French Ivory handle, a 4-inch French Ivory nail stick, and a 4½-inch nail polisher or buffer with French Ivory Top. All these articles are neatly contained in a moire-lined, genuine leather case, measuring 5½ inches wide and 6 inches from end to end when opened. The case rolls up as shown in illustration, and fastens with two snap clasps. In this form it resembles a miniature pocketbook, and is just as convenient to carry, as it measures only 5½x2 inches and only 1 inch in thickness.

Although we offer this Manicure Set for an unusually small club, please understand that each and every piece is strictly high grade and regulation size. We know that every woman and girl who accepts this offer and earns one of these splendid Sets will be more than delighted with it. It is free on the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this splendid French Ivory Manicure Set in a roll-up leather case free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8124.

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for a small club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regular size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7625.

She Is Looking For A Mother

"Peggy" The New Winter Doll

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York, but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives as long as it is in some cozy little nook or on a nice big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says the life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Do You Want Her?

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Six Silver Teaspoons

The Ever Popular "Avon" Design

BY buying in large quantities we are enabled to offer our readers this handsome set of six teaspoons for the ridiculously small club mentioned below. They are six inches long, made of pure nickel-silver, so there is no brass to show through, and they will never have that dingy or tarnished appearance even after years of constant use. The design is the beautiful "Avon" deeply embossed on the handles.

The rich design and splendid wearing qualities of these teaspoons combine to make this the most attractive premium offered in years. Our illustration does not do them justice. They must be seen to be appreciated. We know they will exceed your highest expectations.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you six of these fine Nickel-Silver Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 9682.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

A. S., Ohio.—If the wife of the man who holds title to the property you mention is of unsound mind, we think it will be necessary for the court to appoint some one to represent her interest in transferring the title of the property.

MR. C. T., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if, as you state, your husband was injured ten years ago, it would now be too late to bring a negligence action for damages for such injury.

MRS. J. F. C., Louisiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that every marriage superinduces a right of partnership, or community of acquests and gains, if there be no stipulation to the contrary; the community consisting of the profits of all the effects administered by the husband, of the produce of the reciprocal industry and labor of both husband and wife, of property acquired during marriage by donations made to them jointly or by purchase in the name of either, and upon the death of either where the predeceased spouse leaves issue of the marriage, and does not dispose by will of his or her share in the community, the survivor takes in usufruct the share of the deceased in the community property inherited by such issue, but that this usufruct ceases if the survivor enters into a second marriage. We think that if the property of the married couple you mention was community property that upon the death of the wife and the subsequent remarriage of the husband his right to the usufruct of her share of the community property terminated, and the same became the property of the deceased wife's children, uhless otherwise disposed of by the will of the deceased wife; but that the husband can dispose of his share of the community property in such manner as he may see fit, subject only to the rights of his present wife, in case she survives him, and the rights of any minor child or children to their liens and privileges from his estate.

R. Z., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, her separate estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go one-half to the surviving husband, and one-half to her parents, brothers and sisters, depending upon who is left; if no issue, father, mother, brother or sister, the whole estate would go to the surviving husband.

MRS. J. R. L., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman has no interest in her husband's property during his lifetime except that he must support her, unless she abandons him without good cause, and that in case she survives him he cannot, by will, bar her from inheriting a one-third interest in his estate in addition to her homestead rights, if any, and certain other small allowances.

MRS. J. W. H., Colorado.—We do not think either men or women are entitled to vote until they become 21 years of age.

MRS. D. M., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, the widow would be entitled to receive all personal property which came to the husband in right of the marriage and also one-half of the real and personal estate of which the husband was owner at the time of his death, provided she makes the proper written election to take such property subject to the payment of her husband's debts; if decedent leaves no child, parent, brother, sister nor descendant of any of these, the surviving widow would take the whole estate.

MRS. L. W., Wisconsin.—If your fence encroached upon the highway, and the highway was properly laid out, we think your local authorities had a legal right to remove the fence, but we do not think they had any legal right to do so if your fence was upon your own property.

MRS. E. B., Indiana.—Under the laws of Missouri, we are of the opinion that if the present owners of the land you mention have been in possession of the same for over thirty years, you could not now eject them therefrom even though their title was defective in the first instance.

L. S., Indiana.—If the note you mention was protested at the date of maturity, we think the endorser can be held for the payment thereof at any time thereafter in case the maker fails to pay same, but that he would in turn be entitled to collect from the maker of the note, and that, of course, he would be relieved from payment in case the statute of limitations was allowed to run against the note.

MRS. F. C. C., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, no parent, no brother nor sister, the whole estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to the surviving widow, but that her share in case he left any of the above specified heirs at law or next of kin would depend upon who is left, in no event being less than one-third.

F. E. H., Massachusetts.—We think the laws of your state require three witnesses to a will, all of which should be competent and disinterested persons but need not be lawyers or notaries; we think a lawyer should be employed in preparing a will as the law relating thereto is technical and too much depends upon the proper drawing and execution of a will to consider the small saving made by the testator's drawing his own will.

W. C., Ohio.—In addressing a letter to a judge you should use the title of Honorable.

MRS. E. A. B., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property, real and personal, owned by either the husband or wife before marriage, and all acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent and also the increase of all such, is the separate property of such husband or wife, and is subject to his or her management except that transfer by the wife must be joined in by the husband; all property acquired by the husband and wife during marriage, except in the manner heretofore enumerated, is considered common or community property, and during the marriage may be disposed of by the husband without the consent of the wife, and it is liable for the debts of the husband and for the debts of the wife contracted by her during coverture, for necessaries; upon the death of either party, one-half of the common property goes to the survivor, and the remainder, in the absence of testamentary disposition, to the child or children of the deceased. We think the husband can be compelled to support his wife unless she abandons him without good cause, or unless she has separate property sufficient to provide for her support.

MRS. J. C., New Jersey.—Under the laws of Maryland, we are of the opinion that marriage licenses are required, we do not think that it is necessary to have marriage witnesses from your own state.

J. H. H., Washington.—If you simply sold the timber from your property and the same has been cut and removed, we do not think it will be necessary for you to procure a quit claim deed from the purchaser of the timber.

T. B. B., Missouri.—We are unable to form an opinion as to whether the reference in the deed to you of the property you mention as to the note you mention would make a defect of your title to the property without an examination of the records and of the deed; we think you should have such an examination made by some local attorney.

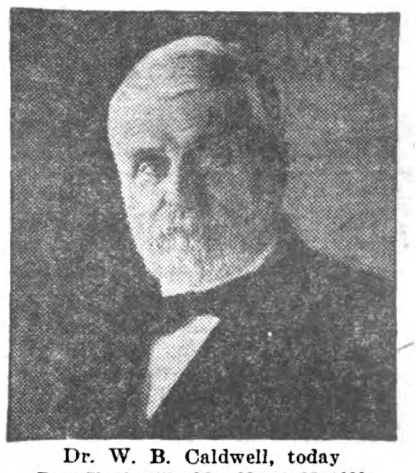
$10,000 Worth of Syrup Pepsin Free



I will give away this amount of money in my own medicine —There is a free trial bottle waiting for every family that has a sufferer from constipation —Send today for your bottle

TO commemorate my 84th birthday I have set aside $10,000 in cash to be expended entirely on free trial bottles of my Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which as people know has been successfully used for over 30 years and is today the largest selling family laxative in the world. In spite of that fact there must be literally thousands of families who have never tried it, and these are the ones I hope to reach with my $10,000 offer.

I want to prove to them that my Syrup Pepsin is a better-acting, safer, finer laxative than any other they can obtain. But I don't want them to be at any expense in trying it, and hence I offer a test bottle free. Later on, when thoroughly convinced of its unusual merits they can buy a bottle of their druggist. Over 10 million bottles of Syrup Pepsin are now sold every year in drug stores, yet my company will not profit one cent when you buy your first bottle. It costs us more to sell the first one than we get for it. Our profit comes only when a family keeps it regularly in the house, as I expect yours will when you are once convinced.

Many unthinking parents are giving children strong cathartics; old people are taking salt waters and powders, that make them dry and thirsty and which have to be repeated every day; women are using artificial coal-tar drugs in candy form that cause skin eruptions. Don't do it! See that only a plain vegetable laxative is used, not a druggy physic. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a vegetable compound of Egyptian senna and pepsin with pleasant-tasting aromatics. Just that! The formula is on the package.

I want you to have a free trial bottle of Syrup Pepsin in your home. I want you to share in my $10,000 offer. Yet

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, today
Born Shelbyville, Mo., March 27, 1839

I know if you delay answering you will be disappointed. Ask me now for the free trial bottle if anyone in your family has constipation, biliousness, flatulency, wind or gas on the stomach, sour colicky stomach, headache, loss of appetite and sleep, indigestion, intestinal poisoning, dyspepsia. Syrup Pepsin is intended for just such conditions. Watch it break up a fever or a cold!

Let me send you a trial bottle to prove these facts. My saying so won't prove it half as well as your trying it. Be one of the thousands who will use Syrup Pepsin free because of my 84th birthday. Send the coupon, or your address in any way most convenient to you. But do it quickly.

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 553 Washington St., Monticello, Illinois

In commemoration of your 84th birthday, and as my family has never used your Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, send me a free trial bottle to the address below:

ALL FREE

Let Us Give You This Fruit And Flower Garden!

WE have made a new arrangement this season with a well-known nursery company, whereby we can now offer our readers a complete fruit orchard and flower garden consisting of some of the finest apples, pears, berries, grapes and ornamental shrubs grown. The stock will be sent to you direct from the nursery in Michigan, by parcel post prepaid. We guarantee that it will reach you in perfect condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. If for any reason any of the trees, bushes, vines or shrubs should fail to meet with your expectations we will replace them for you free of all charge.

ALL of the grape vines, raspberries and dewberries in these Collections are healthy, well-rooted year-old plants. They should bear fruit the second year. The apple and pear tree grafts are made from heavy one-year-old roots and scions of this year's growth. They should grow from four to six feet the first year. The shrubs are one year old and should bloom the first year from planting. With each Collection you will also receive full instructions on planting, pruning, and the care of fruit and shrubs, what fertilizer to use and the kind of soil best adapted to the production of heavy yields. Just read what these big Collections contain.

6 Year-Old Grape Vines

Collection No. 8761 These are not "calloused cuttings" but heavily rooted year-old vines, guaranteed to live and bear fruit the second year. They will grow anywhere in the United States. With these six vines in your yard or garden you will soon have all the table grapes you can use and many more besides, to sell or to give away to your friends. This Collection contains the following varieties:

Two Moore's Diamond A well-known variety that produces immense clusters of grapes, yellowish white in color and similar to the Concord in shape of bunch and flavor. It is very hardy and a thrifty grower, making an unusually good vine for arbor or trellis. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

Two Concord This famous variety is the finest purple grape ever grown. They are large, luscious and juicy and so sweet that little or no sugar is required in making grape juice and jelly. Each one of these vines should produce a bushel of choice grapes in a single season. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

Two Worden Always a favorite, this variety yields large, well-shouldered clusters of deliciously sweet, highly-flavored fruit. Grape juice and jelly made from this grape is of a peculiarly spicy flavor that is relished by all. It is also one of the finest table grapes and a good shipper. It ripens two weeks earlier than the Concord. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

7 Flowering Shrubs

Collection No. 8781 There is nothing that will improve the appearance of your home more than these beautiful ornamental shrubs and vines. From earliest spring until late fall there is not a day but one or more of these shrubs are in bloom. They are field grown, one year old, well rooted and about one foot high when you receive them. This Collection contains the following varieties:

One White Flowering Dogwood—one of the earliest spring bloomers, Two Roses of Sharon—bearing a profusion of large double blossoms from August until late fall, Two Golden Bell—bears tiny bell-shaped yellow flowers, One Hall's Japan Honeysuckle—an ornamental climber with fragrant blossoms, and One Spirea Van Houttei—an early bloomer famed for its handsome foliage and clusters of pretty white flowers. You get these seven ornamentals (five different varieties) in this Collection.

8 Apple And Pear Grafts

Collection No. 8751 Think of the value of an orchard of these eight thrifty, healthy trees. Think how soon they will be yielding bushels of the finest apples and pears grown. With the heavy root system on these grafts they should grow from four to six feet the first year. This Collection contains the following varieties:

Two Delicious The finest winter apple grown, a heavy yielder, and ripens early. The fruit is medium large, delicious in flavor and colored a beautiful red. This variety always sells for the highest market prices as it keeps well and retains its crisp, firm white flesh to the end. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Wealthy A hardy Russian fall apple with deep red and bronze streaked skin. The flesh is firm and crisp, the flavor sweet yet tart. For both eating and cooking it has few equals and is one of the most profitable apples grown. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Jonathan This apple ripens in October and because of its juicy, winy flavor is considered one of the best eating apples on the market. It is red in color with a smooth, waxy skin. You will enjoy gathering the huge crops that this variety invariably yields. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Bartlett Pear One of the best-known varieties, more largely grown than any other. You are probably familiar with its yellow skin with its pronounced red blush, and its sweet, juicy flesh of a delightfully spicy flavor. This variety makes the best table pear, being very mellow when ripe and always yields a heavy crop. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Our Free Offer!

FOR only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you any one of these Collections free by parcel post prepaid. For two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you any two Collections—for three one-year subscriptions any three Collections—and so on. When ordering please be sure to mention the number of the Collection wanted.

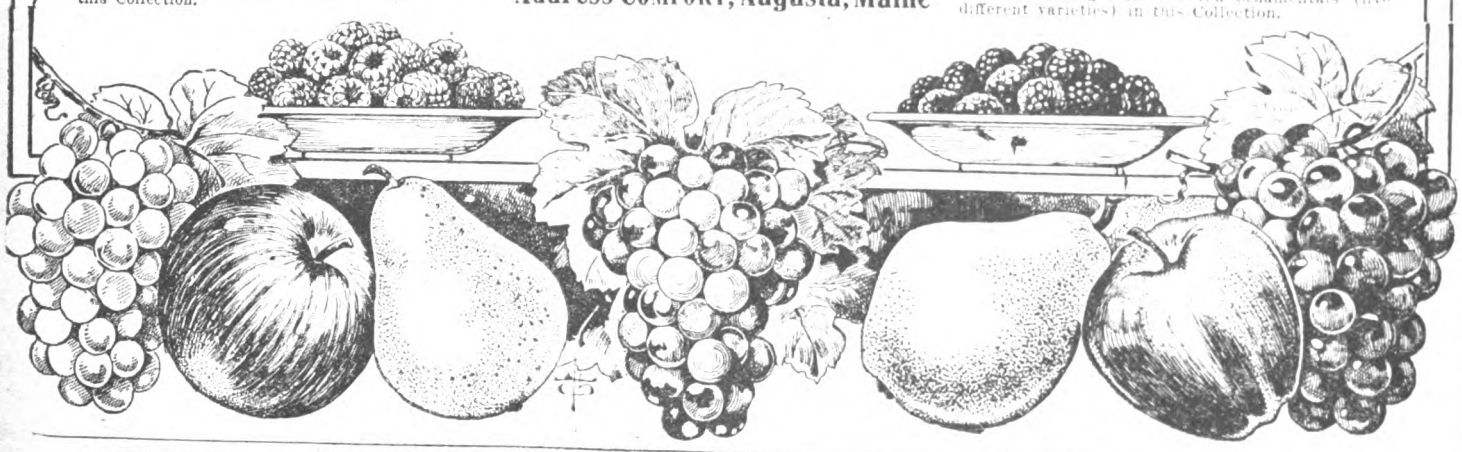
8 Luscious New Fruits

Collection No. 8771 Your garden is not complete without berries and in this Collection you will receive three of the finest varieties grown. For the table, for the most delicious jams, jellies and preserves, they are unexcelled. Each plant is one year old with strong, healthy roots. The Collection contains the following varieties:

Four Lucretia Dewberry A vigorous grower that attains such size that the support of a trellis is really needed. The vines are literally covered with immense clusters of delicious wine-flavored berries, averaging one and one-half inches in length, very sugary, remarkably juicy and having but a few fine seeds. You get four of these year-old vines in this Collection.



Two Red Raspberry This variety (St. Regis) is the finest everbearing red raspberry. The bush is a rapid grower, bearing fruit ten days earlier than most other varieties and continuing to bear throughout the summer and fall. The fruit is large, of delightful flavor, sweet and very juicy, and ripens in large clusters. You get two of these year-old bushes in this Collection.

Two Black Raspberry This variety (Black Diamond) is named from its habit of fruiting in large clusters. The berries are of good size, remarkably sweet and juicy, but firm in texture. The canes grow rapidly and are very tall and upright. Its distinguishing feature, however, is its immense yield which together with its fine quality make this the most desirable garden and market berry. You get two of these year-old bushes in this Collection.

7 Flowering Shrubs

Collection No. 8791 With one exception this Collection is different from Collection No. 8781, although comprising shrubs which bloom from spring until late fall. All of them are field grown, one year old, well rooted and about one foot high when you receive them. In this Collection you will receive the following varieties:

Two Roses of Sharon, One Snow Ball Hydrangea—a midsummer bloomer bearing immense quantities of snowy-white blossoms, One Purple Lilac—its fragrant purple flowers need no description, Two Thunberg Barberry—fine for a hedge, bearing pretty red berries which stay on all winter, and One Trumpet Vine—a hardy climber for porch or arbor, bearing throughout summer and fall large clusters of orange-colored flowers. You get these seven ornamentals (five different varieties) in this Collection.

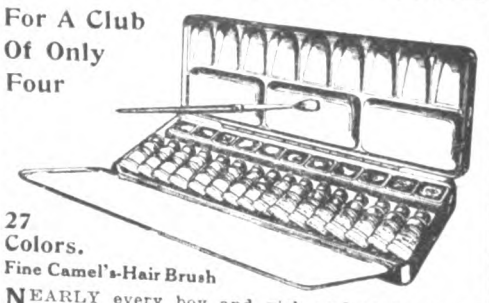
SELF-FILLING Fountain Pen

For A Club Of Three



HERE is a fountain pen that we can positively guarantee. Perhaps you have had some experience with fountain pens which never would write well and continually leaked ink all over your fingers. If so you will certainly appreciate this opportunity to secure a fountain pen that has none of these defects. Our illustration is of course greatly reduced in size. The pen offered you here is 6½ inches long, made entirely of hard rubber, finely finished, and the pen point is genuine 14-K gold. The feeding device is perfect, permitting a uniform flow of ink and it will not leak. Also please notice that this is a self-filling pen. You can fill this fountain pen in less than 10 seconds by pressing down the spring on the side, then placing the pen point in a bottle of ink, after which you release the spring and the pen is instantly filled with ink to its full capacity. If given proper care this pen should last anybody for years. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these self-filling fountain pens with a positive guarantee that if it fails to prove satisfactory in any way you may return it to us and we will replace it with a new pen free of charge.

Club Offer. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this guaranteed self-filling fountain pen free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8873.

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the months to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "prong" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Eight Wheel Chairs in January

671 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

In our January issue I expressed my pleasure at being able to close the Wheel-Chair account for 1922 with the announcement of six chairs awarded and shipped in December, and I am delighted now to report a creditable and hopeful beginning of the new year for this department by the award and shipment of eight wheel chairs in January. I am sure a lot of you good people showed the true Christmas spirit by your work and generosity in behalf of the shut-ins who were suffering for a much-needed wheel chair. I thank you.

The recipients of the eight January wheel chairs are: Mr. D. P. Ferrell, R. 3, Friendship, Tenn., 170; Frances Alvord, Camden, N. Y., 151; Mrs. W. Tunnell, R. 4, Box 11 B, Fort Worth, Texas, 87; Mrs. Martha Ellen Westbrook, Gandy, La., 71; Robert Earle Lawhorn, R. 5, Buena Vista, Ga., 65; Mary Arleen Miller, Ray, Ohio, 63; Miss Jeannette Deskins, Logan, W. Va., 62; Beatrice Alston, Vernon, Texas, 62. The figures following their respective addresses indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these applicants or by their friends for them.

Mr. D. P. Ferrell, age 80, is crippled in his feet by effects of slow fever about ten years ago which settled in his feet, but since last November has been confined to his bed by heart trouble. I hope the wheel chair will relieve his discomfort.

Frances Alvord is "a little crippled girl," which is all I know about her, and this bit of information is quoted from the letter of her good friend and neighbor, Sylvia Armstrong, who sent the entire 151 subscriptions for Frances's chair all in one bunch.

Mrs. W. Tunnell, age 36, has suffered severely from rheumatism for the past six years, entirely crippling her lower limbs and partly crippling her hands.

Mrs. Martha Ellen Westbrook, age 47, for fourteen years past has suffered from chronic rheumatism which has deprived her of the use of her lower limbs and nearly crippled her hands.

Robert Earl Lawhorn, age eight, is crippled by spinal trouble and disease of the left hip which came upon him at such an early age that he has never been able to walk.

Mary Arleen Miller, age 10, has been crippled from birth by spinal trouble so that she has never walked and her legs are drawn up. She is one of a large family of children, and the wheel chair will be a blessed relief to her and a help to her busy mother in caring for her.

BERTHA MATHENY ENJOYING HER COMFORT WHEEL CHAIR.

Miss Jeannette Deskins, age 28, is crippled from her hips down by the effects of typhoid fever which attacked her at five years of age and left her unable to walk or even stand. She has had two wheel chairs before from other sources but both are now useless, and she is in much need of her COMFORT chair.

Beatrice Alston, age three, is paralyzed from her hips down by spinal trouble which she has suffered from birth, and has never walked. She is a bright little girl and will enjoy her wheel chair which will also be a great help to her mother in caring for her.

Is it not a joy to have been instrumental, as each of you who procured subscriptions for, or contributed cash to, our Wheel-Chair Club have been, in sending such substantial relief to these helpless sufferers?

We have made a splendid start, and so let us do our best to keep up the pace throughout the year.

I have but little space this month for letters of thanks, but you will be interested in that which accompanies the picture of Bertha Matheny.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Delighted at the Comfort She Takes in Her Wheel Chair

Minden, Nebr.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am writing to let you know that Bertha's wheel chair came in good condition. Oh, how delighted she is at the comfort she takes in it! When first we put her in it she exclaimed: "Oh, how nice! Praise God for blessings!" and began singing.

We thank you and the kind friends who have aided us in getting it for her. We sincerely wish you boundless success in the good work you are doing, and will do all we can to get subscriptions to help some other needy cripple to obtain a wheel chair.

Oh, if we had had this wheel chair years ago, what comfort it would have afforded her, and what help to me!

Again thanking you for your kindness to us, and for COMFORT—it surely is a wonderful paper and could not be better named.

Yours sincerely,

Bertha and Mrs. J. A. Matheny.

P. S. We send you picture of Bertha in her COMFORT wheel chair.—Mrs. J. A. M.

You Can Now Try Nuxated Iron At My Expense

I First Compounded This Remarkable Remedy For My Own Neighbors And Their Praise Of It Has Spread So Rapidly That Now Over Four Million People Use It Annually--Read My Unusual Offer Below.

Years ago I began to wonder at the great number of my own friends and neighbors who were always ailing, complaining and doctoring, without ever seeming to get and better. Both working men and their wives were frequently all tired out in the evening, and a great many were weak, nervous and run-down. One had pains in the back and thought he had kidney trouble. Another had pains around the heart, palpitations and dizziness, and was sure he was suffering from heart disease. Still others had severe headaches, floating spots before the eyes tender spots along the spine and a great variety of alarming symptoms.

For years I made a special study of this condition, consulting a great number of physicians and chemists. An immense number of investigations by physicians all over the country showed that three people out of every four you meet lack 100% iron in their blood. Lack of iron in the blood is the greatest of all devitalizing weaknesses. It is the iron in your blood that enables you to get the nourishment out of your food. Without iron, nothing you eat does you any good. Your heart, lungs and kidneys and all your vital organs get their nourishment from the blood stream, and when the blood lacks iron and is thin, pale and watery, you may suffer from the symptoms of a great number of diseases when the real and true cause of all your trouble is a lack of iron in the blood.

In the old days people often took metallic iron, which some physicians claim is not absorbed at all. In compounding this newer form of iron which I call Nuxated Iron, I employed a special form of iron, which is like the iron in your blood and like the iron in spinach, lentils and apples. Unlike the older forms of iron, it will not injure the teeth nor disturb the stomach, and it is ready for almost immediate absorption and assimilation by the blood. It is the people whose blood is rich in iron who possess great strength, force and energy. If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test:

Cut out trial coupon and go to any druggist and get your first trial package or Nuxated Iron; then see how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two 5-grain tablets of Nuxated Iron three times a day after meals for two weeks, then test your strength again and see how much you have gained. An astonishing number of nervous, run-down people who were ailing all the while, have greatly improved their health and increased their strength, energy and endurance simply by taking this newer form of iron.

Trial Coupon

Fill in this coupon with your name and address and take it to any druggist in your city. Deposit with him the price of one regular full-size bottle of Nuxated Iron. This is not a payment, but a deposit only. If you are not more than delighted with the results obtained by two weeks' use of Nuxated Iron, simply return the outside wrapper to your own druggist who will promptly refund your money. We will repay the druggist the full amount he refunds upon receipt of the coupon and wrapper.

NUXATED IRON ENRICHES THE BLOOD-GIVES YOU NEW STRENGTH AND ENERGY

A Republic Within a Republic

HOW many people of the United States know that within its boundaries is another independent republic that is perfectly organized and that it is independent of both state and national governments?

Such a republic is to be found in western North Carolina, known as the Qualla Reserve, and is the home of about 1,000 Cherokee Indians belonging to the eastern branch of that tribe. This republic has an area of 82 square miles, or approximately 50,000 acres of probably the richest land in the state, lying along the Soco, Ocona and Lufta creeks.

The president of this unique republic is elected every four years and receives a salary of $500 a year; but when at Washington on business for the republic he receives $4 a day extra pay. He is designated Chief, and none but a Cherokee of more than 35 years of age is eligible to the office. During the absence of the Chief his duties are performed by an assistant chief or president, who receives a salary of $250 a year. The president has a cabinet of three members, who are designated secretaries. They assist him in the performance of his duties in an advisatory capacity. The congress of this little republic consists of two delegates or representatives for every one hundred members of the tribe. All Cherokee males of sixteen years of age, and all white men living within the boundaries of the republic who have Indian wives are given the right to vote. The constitution of this little republic provides for the maintenance of a public institution of learning, in which both English and Cherokee are taught. The inhabitants of this well-organized and unique republic, within a republic, are intelligent, law-abiding, fairly well educated, and industrious citizens.

RITA or, the OUTCAST SISTER

By LIBBIE SPRAGUE PHILLIPS

SPECIAL SALE PRICE with a six (6) months' subscription to THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION ONLY 25 CENTS.

This Book contains one of this noted author's best novels.

Pressed close against the window pane was a wan, white face.

The pathos of this story sweeps all before it. It touches the heart of humanity everywhere. Even the man with a heart of stone learns from this story that deep down under the cold, hard strata of stone, he has in his heart a deep well of human sympathy for the erring one; that he has also a heart capable of love and admiration for the good and noble character of Luella, the gentle, loving, self-sacrificing sister. Righteous indignation is aroused toward Silas Lockwood, her relentless and unnatural father. The heart's emotions like a great ocean billow, rolls on from the beginning to end of the book; when you lay it down and say blessed is God who rules over all for the good of all. Thousands will want to read this book and pass it on to their friends. Libbie Sprague Phillips writes exclusively for THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION; has done so for 20 years. One minister has furnished it with sermons for 17 years; other writers have contributed regularly for years. THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION is 45 years old. The years of continued service of its writers show that our magazine is one of fixed and standard worth. We know you will enjoy reading it. THIS OFFER of magazine 6 months and book, for 25 cents is made to get new trial subscribers. Book without paper 12 cents.

Deformed 7 Years by Infantile Paralysis

Frances Hall's condition after 5½ months at McLain Sanitarium astonished those who knew her as a cripple for 7 years.

Read Her Parents' Letter

"It hardly seems possible that Frances' foot could be so changed in 5½ months. Her heel was 3¾ inches from the floor when she left home. Now she steps flat on the floor, although slightly lame. Her limb has increased in size, is straight and she has good use of it. All her friends think it is almost a miracle."

rooms are plentiful to gather experts, that places and times are many for lizards to lounge. The big open stretches of the West and Southwest and your own fine north country offer no breeding ground for these parasites to lead pallid lives. And as for the girls and "drug store complexions," these scenic-colored cheeks are most plentiful where drug stores are most numerous. The flapper flaps best where there is the best chance for her to try her wings. It is true, I'm sorry to say, that even rather small towns can sometimes show the young Theda Baras and the corner "specimens" you attack, but these foolish fledgelings are few in number, and their standard and model is one that cities have set. I would say, God help the youth of America, if all our boys and girls were living where such exhibits of wrongly-directed and spoilt young lives were fostered. But they are not, Inez. The youth of America is sound to the core, and smooth and red-cheeked men when developed in places where healthy growth is possible, and where homes offer the proper human soil for tender roots. It is the home that counts first, Inez. You know this, I'm sure, but I say it again. We are all products of heredity and environment—that is, of parentage and surroundings. Youth is a fine fruit whose bloom can only be kept by delicate handling. Bruises and specks can be formed but too easily. If homes do not give loving and careful nurture, youth suffers. Freshness and bloom are soiled and young lives begin to run along harmful and crooked grooves. Sometimes a chance for rot is started from the first bruises which might have been missed. Cities do not offer homes for most people; they only offer lodgings for a night. Abnormal lives must always be the result of abnormal living. We must love the best of our youth, not the "minority" you speak of, Inez, but a great big majority well worth loving—and look with regret and pity on those who have been let choose wrong ideals and useless unhappy ways.

MT. PLEASANT, R. R. 2, VIRGINIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

What I want to say is that I live in the oldest house in Kecksburg, my home town. So you see the town is no older than the house which was built in 1804. I am forty-seven years old and have always lived in the same house.

Kecksburg is a village. There are forty dwelling houses, two stores, one barber shop, a central telephone office, and four pretty girls.

Your nephew, JOHN H. GETTEMY.

All right, John, we have your message and are glad to know you have the ancient honor of living in the oldest house in the metropolis of Kecksburg. You say you have dwelt there all of your forty-seven years, John, my boy; but suppose that you had lived there since the house was built in 1804? What a lot you would have seen and heard and how much you might have written us about instead of sending us such a short letter! Well, perhaps you are not so much to blame for the scarcity of news, for I fancy that not much can happen in Kecksburg in the narrow space of but forty-seven years. Still one can always pick up gossip about a barber shop—and you have one of these institutions. You do send us an important item in your listing of the "four pretty girls," but I fear for the accuracy of this count. It only allows one beautiful Kecksburg damsel for each ten "dwelling houses." John, it may be asking too much, but what sort of girls live in the other thirty-six houses? I want to know for the honor of the Old Dominion. You can't make me believe that pretty Virginia girls are as scarce as this. Living so long under one roof may have made your eyesight of the vintage of 1804 the same as the rafters. Just look around once more and send in another report.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for February

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Amanda Murphy, Decaturville Tenn. An old lady of 88 years, unable to earn her own support. Help her last years. Mrs. E. J. Clayton, Alabama City, Ala. A friend of COMFORT for 20 years, Mrs. Clayton now must ask aid of other COMFORT friends—having reached an age and time when she can no longer support herself. Dartha Grigg, Glen Allen, R. R. 1, Box 33, Pa. Crippled and bedridden, this poor woman asks help in the form of cash or clothes. A worthy case. Isaac Price, Lenoir, N. C. Helpless for 51 years from rheumatism, the appeal of this man and his aged wife is sad to read. A shower of dimes, a sprinkle of greenbacks, will make their lot easier to bear. Miss Lizzie Gormely, Buffalo, Ill. Weak and dependent upon charity for support, this suffering woman asks money to buy her food. Mrs. Agnes Freeman, Spencer, Va. Clothes or cash will aid this mother to struggle on. Give her the boost she needs. Mrs. Mollie Burris, Price, N. C. Crippled by rheumatism for 15 years, this woman sends an earnest letter asking aid through these cold months. Marie Bentz, Norfolk, 436 So. 4th St., Neb. A shut-in unable to walk, Miss Bentz would be grateful for crochet patterns to cheer her dull hours. No other aid is asked. Mrs. M. J. Cline, care of Mrs. Ralph Smith, Benton, R. R. 2, Pa. A widow who has found it impossible to support herself during the past year. Send her cash and cheer that the next 12 months may be brighter. Mrs. Sadie Williams, Huntingburg, Ind., sends words of earnest gratitude for the aid of COMFORT readers who have made her winter an easier and happier one.

This is midwinter, and it means then the height of pain, cold and shut-in hours to those whose names are listed this month of February. Do not weary of well doing now, when help is needed most of all and will be the most welcome. Give these suffering bodies and hearts a boost that will carry them through until spring brings brighter days.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, as after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

France claims to carry more passengers in commercial airplanes than England. In one year passenger air traffic increased from 729 to 5,864 passengers. More than a million miles were covered by commercial planes in one year. The longest traffic route is Toulouse, France, to Casablanca, Morocco, which requires a day and a half, including the over-night stop. Other routes are Paris to London, Paris to Brussels, Paris to Amsterdam, Paris to Strasbourg and Prague, Paris to Warsaw, Bayonne to Bilbao and Santander, Bordeaux to Toulouse and Montpelier, Montpelier to Nimes, Avignon and Nice.

Two Turkish Towels

Good Size Soft And Fleecy

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite so fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best form of towel for all purposes whether for the bathroom, guestroom or everyday family use. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the soft fleecy surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being. They are also fine for baby's bath as they will not irritate the tender skin. The towels offered here are 15 inches wide and 32 inches long which is a good serviceable size for all-round family use, and are of good weight, well made and finished. We will make you a present of two of these towels upon the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you one pair (2) of these fine Turkish Towels free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 9912.

aking Pictures of Sound Waves

aking the picture of a noise sounds ut as reasonable as picking up a idful of shadow. It is being done, wever, at the American Telephone and egraph Company's laboratories at 24 lker Street, and the Western Electric mpany's New York experimental rkshop on West Street, New York City. e work is carried on for the purpose improving the transmission of the man voice by telephone, especially r long distances. The machine that es the photograph is called an oscillo- iph.

he method of sound photography is, efly, as follows: The electrical cur- nt carrying the voice, or some other und, is sent through two very fine res, between which is fastened a nute piece of looking-glass. An arc light is focussed on the mirror so that the reflected beam strikes a strip of photographic film wound on a drum. As the drum revolves, the light beam appears as a long, regular, white streak on the film.

These fine wires pass through a magnetic field and when the sound frequency current passes over the wires, it pushes them back and forth. This makes the looking-glass wiggle, which in turn causes the beam of light to move back and forth across the film and photograph as a jagged line instead of a straight one.

Valuable Old Books

At an auction sale recently in New York City a large number of old books were sold at fabulous prices. A copy of the Cloverdale translation of the Bible, printed in 1535, brought $3700. A first edition of Charles Dickens' "Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club" came next in price, bringing $3500. A first edition of Robert Browning's "Pauline," 1833, sold for $1400. The first issue of the first edition of "Robinson Crusoe," 1719, brought $2000. William Cullen Bryant's poem, "The Embargo," 1808, and for which he afterwards expressed regret, went for $1500. A translation of Cervantes' "Don Quixote," London, 1620, brought $500, and Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," 1620, $380. Among others were a first folio edition of Shakespeare which brought $3000, and a third edition of "Henry V," printed in 1608, $1250. A first edition of Izaak Walton's "Compleat Angler" went for $2200, and a letter from Thackeray to Elizabeth Barrett Browning, explaining why he could not print one of her poems, $210.

Here's Another Good One

E. M. Johnson, a Portland knight of the grip, slipped it to me. There was a lot of excitement on the main street of a certain town. A man ran up and asked what it was all about.

"Oh," said a wag in the crowd, a man in a reverie ran into a woman in a tantrum."

And the inquisitive one asked:

"Were the machines badly damaged?"

Pay Little by Little Take a Full Year

Still there's another advantage—an advantage that ought to place these Congoleum Rugs in every American home. In spite of the lowest price in existence — in spite of giving three small rugs to match absolutely free—we bring you the opportunity to clinch this proven bargain without a tiny bit of money worry.

One dollar with the coupon brings all four rugs immediately. And we'll wait a year for the balance of the money. If you keep your rugs after making a 30 days' trial, you can pay us little by little, almost as you please, taking a full year. That's the way we sell everything.

We Want to Place a Congoleum Rug in Every American Home

Congoleum Gold Seal Art Rugs are rapidly becoming the national floor covering — universally used in the kitchen, bathroom and dining room in good homes. People of taste and judgment are glad to use Congoleum Rugs in the best rooms. It's the rug with a hundred superior points.

Waterproof. These rugs are guaranteed absolutely waterproof. There is no burlap in Congoleum Art Rugs for water to rot. The surface is hard and smooth and wear resisting.

They lay flat from the very first moment without any fastening. They never curl or kick up at the edges or corners. There is no need to tack or fasten them down. Dirt cannot accumulate underneath. They follow perfectly any uneveness of the floor.

Less Work Congoleum floors mean less worry and no back breaking drudgery. Dirt, ashes, grit, dust or mud cannot "grind into" Congoleum Art Rugs, because the surface is hard and does not absorb. A damp rag keeps a Congoleum Art Rug clean and does not hurt or damage it.

"Put up again Thy Sword into Its Place; for All They that Take the Sword Shall Perish with the

THOSE who are familiar with the Christian Scriptures, as all should be, will recognize the above headline as the words spoken by Jesus in rebuke of Peter for his lawless act in smiting the emissary of the high priest sent to arrest the Master. Many regard this severe denunciation as the imprecation of a curse on those who resort to violence as a means of furthering their purposes; but, be that as it may, it surely makes plain the truth that lawlessness tends to provoke retaliation in kind and work the destruction of those who appeal to brute force for settlement of their grievances. History is replete with examples of disaster to those "that take the sword", and a notable instance of such retribution is seen in the recent popular uprising and administration of mob law provoked by a series of acts of lawless and destructive violence committed in connection with and furtherance of a long continued railroad strike in Arkansas.

Please understand at the outset that our comments on this Arkansas case are offered, not as an expression of approval nor as a plea in justification of the community action in unlawfully assuming to execute the law in its own way, but for the purpose of pointing out the disastrous reaction likely to result from a resort to lawlessness by strikers. Where crime becomes so rampant as to evoke a lawless assumption of the functions of retributive justice there is a demoralizing and dangerous approach to anarchy that can not be too strongly condemned. The main facts of this deplorable Arkansas affair, as reported in the papers, are briefly summarized as follows:

In 1921 a strike was called to resist a reduction of wages on the Missouri and North Arkansas Railroad whose line, a 150 miles in length, serves a large section of country chiefly devoted to farming. The strike dragged along and after a while, as too often happens when strikes are not quickly settled to the satisfaction of the strikers, there was resort to criminal violence: attempts were made to tie up transportation and terrorize the public by destruction of railroad property, whereby, not only was traffic much impeded, but public safety imperiled. This reign of terror progressed from bad to worse until brought to an abrupt end on January 16th of the present year by a popular uprising which, acting through the instrumentality of its "Committee of 1000", effectually cleaned up the situation which by that time had become absolutely intolerable to the community composed, as it was, largely of farmers dependent on this railroad for getting their produce out to market and getting in necessary supplies.

The sabotage inflicted on this railroad in the ten weeks immediately preceding the clean-up is reported to have included the burning of ten bridges, various damages to trestles and tracks, the crippling of locomotives, and the cutting of air-brake connections to put cars out of commission. It is asserted that more than twenty bridges were burned during the last half of last year. The railroad was practically paralyzed. and the farmers along its line were in desperate straits. The remedies which the law provided had totally failed, as they claimed, because of the inefficiency and disinclination of the State and local authorities to take vigorous measures for the suppression of lawlessness. Therefore they felt compelled, as a matter of self preservation, to take the administration of justice into their own hands for the restoration of law and order and public safety. Accordingly they organized and, as previously described, took action through the "Community of 1000", and it cannot be denied that, for so doing, they had provocation so strong as to be almost irresistible to human nature. Of course the methods of the "Committee" were reprehensible, some of them extremely so, but it must be remembered that they acted in extreme stress of circumstances and under great excitement and nervous strain.

The homes of such of the strikers as were under suspicion were visited and searched; one striker, who resisted search, was hung; a hotel keeper, who by furnishing bail had procured the release of several strikers previously arrested under due process of law, was publicly whipped; the furniture of the strikers' meeting-hall, in Harrison, was taken to the public square and burned; the city marshal of Harrison, reported to have been accused of sympathizing with the strikers, was whipped and ordered to leave town; scores of strikers were driven over the State line into Missouri, and the Mayor and Board of Aldermen of Harrison were called upon to resign.

We quote the following extracts from the editorial comments of Arkansas papers as reflecting public sentiment in that State. The Arkansas Gazette, published at the State capital, while deploring the hanging of the striker, yet defends the community action in handling the situation by strong-arm methods, asserting that "the patience of the people was exhausted, and they rose for the protection of rights that it seemed could not be protected in any other way. * * * The attack on the property of the railroad was a challenge to the whole State." The Harrison Times, published at the storm center of the disturbance, says: "Without this railroad, which serves 200,000 people, farms would lose at least half their value and many business houses would be ruined. Why, therefore, should the people sit openly by and let the unions wreck the State, and bully and intimidate the people?" As to the hanging of the striker this paper declares that "the union officials who recently voted to continue the strike are as directly responsible for Gregor's death as the men who actually strung him up." The Arkansas farmers plead dire necessity in justification of their usurpation of law-enforcement and point with pride to the fact that they "cleaned up" in two days a pestiferous state of lawlessness that had persisted two years unattended to by the constituted authorities.

Leading journals in other States are unsparing in their denunciation of this outbreak of "mob violence". Most of them are in substantial agreement with the New York Herald, which says: "Mob law can not be excused in a country where all the machinery of justice is supposed to be available at any moment to meet any offense against law." This statement is ideally correct and theoretically sound, and ought, without exception, to be true in fact, but too often, as was instanced in the case in point, "the machinery of justice" utterly fails "to meet" a series of most flagrant offenses committed in defiance of law. Some prominent eastern papers express the more rational opinion that the Arkansas uprising is a "reflection upon the Governor of the State and the local sheriffs under his control, whose supineness throughout recent months of disorder has supplied a temptation to violence." While it is perfectly proper and eminently desirable to hold up high ideals, yet in dealing with the actual affairs of life exceptional conditions arise in which theories do not hold good, and the frailty of human nature must be taken into account, and care must be had not to strain it to the breaking point.

Mid theorizing and idealizing it is best that, for the attainment of practical results, there be a general recognition of the fact, so abundantly demonstrated, that although the good people of America are patient and long-suffering there is a limit to their tolerance of lawlessness, and when or where this limit is exceeded they will supplement the law with effective measures of their own for the suppression of crime. In line with this is the Boston News Bureau's observation that "The corollary is that administration or execution of law must in many places and in many ways be greatly improved. Governors and sheriffs supinely and falsely avow they have situations 'in hand' or 'under control' when later explosions reveal how stupid or craven they were. * * * The vital thing is the majesty and supremacy of the law. SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Brownie Douglas, waiting at Memorial Hall, Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, is joined by her friend, Aspasia Huntington, a wealthy Baltimore belle, who meets with a slight accident in her dress, attracting the attention of two gentlemen, Adrian Dredmond, an Englishman, and Mr. Gordon who recognizes Brownie, she being an intimate friend of his sisters. Her father, dying before she is born, and her mother at her birth, she is adopted by her great aunt, who gives her her name Mehetabel and brings her up to remember she is a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility. Her nurse calls her Brownie from the first. Adrian Dredmond, stepping upon something, picks up a costly cuff button with a large D, studded with brilliants, and the word "Brownie" in finest letters upon the back. That night Miss Mehetabel Douglas tells Brownie the story of her life, her betrothal to Lord Dunforth, the ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Ruxley, her introduction to Count de Lussan, a man of questionable reputation, her refusal to cancel a dance at Lord Dunforth's command, Helen Capel's treachery in suppressing a note, her serious illness, her coming to America, where her father and mother soon died. She gives Brownie her jewels, including her engagement ring, coral cross and all other gifts from Lord Dunforth, and when she is gone she requests her to take the chain and key from her neck and wear it as long as she lives. That night she dies and upon the reading of the will Mr. Conrad, who has the care of her aunt's property, admits using and losing money entrusted to him, leaving Brownie, after all debts and legacies to the servants are paid, two hundred dollars. Refusing Mr. Conrad's offer to relieve her from anxiety and have her home with him or go with Miss Huntington as her companion, she secures employment in New York, wiring hats. The work hard, she is helped by Mattie Burnham who wins her love and together in the public library Brownie, reading to her in French, attracts the attention of an elderly gentleman who kindly asks if she is a teacher and speaks any other language. Learning she is musical would she be persuaded to teach. If the opportunity presented itself she would and mentions Ware and Coolidge where she is employed. His card, given to her, bears the name of Wm. H. Alcott, M. D. Brownie, called to the office, meets Dr. Alcott, who has recommended her to his son-in-law, Mr. Coolidge, as being competent to superintend the education of his two younger daughters and to be a companion and interpreter on a proposed trip to Europe. Requiring references, Brownie mentions Mr. Arthur Conrad which satisfies Dr. Alcott; they were classmates. Going to the Coolidge home, Mrs. Coolidge and the eldest daughter Isabel admit her personal charms but are jealous of her beauty and many accomplishments and hope her meeting Wilbur will be avoided. The wish fails and Wilbur is determined to know her better. Boarding the steamer, Brownie is saved from an accident by Adrian Dredmond. Wilbur relieves him of further care and takes her to his mother and sister who realize Wilbur's infatuation for Brownie. Adrian Dredmond, standing near, overhears their determination to prevent Wilbur's further attention. Going to London they take a house near where Miss Mehetabel lived, was wooed and won. Wilbur buys tickets for her majesty's opera for the family and insists that Miss Douglas shall go. Mrs. Coolidge objects, but changing her mind requests Brownie to wear anything but black or white. Deciding upon her dress and jewels, among which is a coral cross, Mrs. Coolidge is surprised to find her so radiant and decides it shall not occur again.

CHAPTER XIII.

A SCENE.

HER Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane, was crowded to its utmost capacity when our party arrived.

But having secured a private box, this circumstance did not inconvenience them in the least.

Wilbur Coolidge took care, after his mother and Isabel were comfortably seated, that Miss Douglas should have a place where she could command a good view of the stage.

He was no other than Adrian Dredmond! lovely governess, and strove by numerous little attentions to atone in part for their rudeness.

A battery of lorgnettes was immediately leveled at this brilliant company and there were numberless surmisings and questionings as to who the newcomers could be.

In a box not far from the Coolidge party there sat a royal-looking couple—an old gentleman, still hale and hearty, although upward of sixty-five, and a matron of perhaps a half-dozen years younger.

By the side of the latter, and assiduously attending to her wants, was a young man of about two-and-twenty.

It was no other than Adrian Dredmond!

He, too, had leveled his glass as the newcomers settled themselves in their places.

After one sweeping glance, he half-started from his chair, with a low exclamation of pleasure.

"Whom do you see, Adrian?" asked the lady by his side.

"Some friends who came over in the same steamer with me, I believe," he replied, taking another look, and a smile of pleasure curving his fine lips as his eye rested upon Brownie, who seemed to him in her elegant robes like some beautiful vision from another sphere.

"Americans?" demanded his companion, preparing to adjust her own glass.

"Yes, your ladyship," was the quiet response.

"Ah!"

Her ladyship, as she uttered this with a slight accent of contempt, evidently did not deem them worthy the effort of a glance, and accordingly turned her glass toward the stage, the curtain having risen for the first act.

For a time the attention of all was attracted in the same direction.

Brownie sat as one entranced, forgetting the past, and living over again the exquisite delight which she had so often experienced in by-gone days.

"You are fond of the opera, Miss Douglas?" Wilbur whispered, when the curtain at length fell.

"Passionately," she replied, turning her glowing face toward him; then added: "And, Mr. Coolidge, you have given me the first bit of unalloyed pleasure I have had since great misfortune came upon me."

Her voice quivered, her eyes were dewy, and her breast heaved with the deliciousness of the hour.

"I would I could henceforth give you every joy of earth," he murmured tenderly in her ear.

"Wilbur," his mother said in cold, hard tones, "will you come and arrange your sister's cloak?"

She had watched his every movement, and her heart was in a tumult of rage at that artful girl for presuming to keep him at her side.

A meaning glance was exchanged between mother and daughter as she made her request; and after the cloak was satisfactorily arranged, as he was about returning to his post, Isabel said:

"Sit down here, Wilbur, and point out to me some of the people whom you know."

He pointed out several, when she suddenly exclaimed:

"Why, there is Mr. Dredmond who came over with us, is it not?"

"Yes," dryly replied her brother.

"I like his appearance very much. I wish you would go and bring him here, and introduce him to us."

"What is the use? Any other time will do as well, and it is nearly time for the curtain to rise again," he said impatiently and with an uneasy glance toward Miss Douglas.

"Oh, there is plenty of time. Look! he is bowing to you now."

Wilbur returned the salutation but did not move, and his mother exclaimed:

"Do oblige your sister, Wilbur. He is, indeed, a fine-looking young man; I wonder if he is well connected?"

"Rather. He is grandson to an earl," was the laconic reply.

"An earl!" ejaculated both mother and daughter, in a breath.

"Yes; so I have lately learned, and, notwithstanding he will succeed to an earldom upon his grandfather's death, he is very modest about it, and prefers to be addressed as plain Mr. Dredmond, rather than 'my lord'."

"Wilbur, you must introduce him, by all means. Isabel, who knows what may happen?" and Mrs. Coolidge, much excited at the intelligence she had just received, ruffled her feathers with motherly pride.

"There, Wilbur! I do believe he is coming here. He has left his box, and is coming this way!" exclaimed Isabel, her cheeks flushing a vivid scarlet at the thought of being introduced to a peer of the realm.

Adrian Dredmond was indeed bending his steps in that direction; but had those proud women known that it was on account of their despised governess, and her alone, they would not have been so elated.

Wilbur arose, and met him at the entrance.

"How are you, Coolidge?" exclaimed the young man heartily and extending his hand. "We have not met often of late," he added.

"No; I have been dancing attendance upon the ladies. Will you come in and be introduced?"

"With pleasure," and his eyes lingered upon that graceful figure, clad in maize-colored silk, seated between the two young girls.

Wilbur led him first to his mother and Isabel, then presented him to Viola and Alma, and finally to Brownie, in spite of Mrs. Coolidge's warning glance, as she saw what he was about to do.

The young girl's cheeks kindled to a flame as she laid her daintily-gloved hand in his, and remembered that this handsome stranger, whose name she had not known until this moment, had held her in his arms, and so close to his bosom that she had felt the beating of his great heart.

Wilbur noted her rich color, and the shy drooping of her white lids; he noted, too, the lingering look of admiration which the young man bent upon her, and a great pain smote his heart—a fear that trouble, and disaster to his hopes, would follow this introduction.

Mr. Dredmond was invited to a seat by Isabel, and instantly monopolized by her, while Mrs. Coolidge, much elated at the turn events were taking, took care that Wilbur did not resume his position near the governess, but kept him busy answering questions till the opera was over.

Miss Isabel intended that Mr. Dredmond should attend her to the carriage, but by some means in leaving the box they became separated, he standing at the entrance until all had passed out.

Brownie being the last one, he offered her his arm to conduct her through the crowd.

She could not refuse without seeming rude, yet she was keen enough to perceive that the attention would call down the dire displeasure of her employer upon her head.

In the lobby they encountered an old gentleman and lady. In an instant the gaze of the former became riveted upon Miss Douglas.

He stopped in her path.

His face grew ghastly white, his lips twitched nervously and he breathed as if terribly agitated.

Brownie lifted her eyes, and was startled at his appearance. It seemed to her as if she were confronting a madman. He bent toward her until his quick breath smote her cheek. He did not seem to notice her companion; and all his faculties were concentrated upon the startled girl.

He lifted his shaking hand and touched with one finger that glittering cross upon her bosom.

"There is but one cross like that in the world," he muttered. "Girl, girl, where did you get it?" he demanded hoarsely.

Before she could collect her scattered senses to reply the crowd surged in between them; the old man was borne one way, Brownie and her companion the other, and she only caught one more glimpse of a pair of deep, fathomless eyes, filled with keenest pain, a white, set face, its lips livid and rigid.

Then she found herself in the fresh, cool air, and Adrian Dredmond saying, in tones of apology:

"You will excuse him, Miss Douglas; he is an old man."

"Certainly; but he startled me somewhat," she answered, drawing a deep breath; and before she could ask if he knew who the strange gentleman was, she found they were beside the Coolidge carriage.

"Really Miss Douglas, is it you at last? You have kept us waiting until we are tired," exclaimed Isabel peevishly.

"I hope you have not been troubled, Mr. Dredmond," apologized Mrs. Coolidge graciously and giving Brownie a withering look.

"Oh, no; it has given me pleasure to attend Miss Douglas," blundered the young man, saying the very worst thing possible.

"I am sorry to have kept you waiting, Mrs. Coolidge, but the crowd detained us, and my cloak caught upon one of the seats," explained Brownie.

"Crowd, indeed! I've seen governesses before this who liked to flirt," sneered the irate Isabel under her breath.

Both Mr. Dredmond and Miss Douglas caught the insolent words, and they aroused all the fire in the young girl's blood.

With the air of a queen she turned as she was about entering the carriage, and holding out her little hand she said to Mr. Dredmond:

"Thank you, Mr. Dredmond, for your kindness, and good night."

He bowed low over her hand, then assisting her to enter the carriage, lifted his hat to the others and turned away, but not before he had noted the menacing looks cast upon the poor little governess for her audacity.

"Miss Douglas, please step this way one moment," Mrs. Coolidge commanded in icy tones upon entering the house.

She led the way toward the library, Brownie following, with head erect, and a mien which even the fashionable and imposing Mrs. Coolidge could not subdue.

"I wish it distinctly understood, Miss Douglas," the matron began, with a look which would have annihilated the young girl had she possessed less of the spirit of heroes within her, "that hereafter you are to receive no attention from gentlemen while you remain in my employ. Miss Isabel's prospects are not to be interfered with by you."

Brownie's red lips curled with scorn.

She met her glance proudly and without the quiver of a nerve.

"Mrs. Coolidge I have not the slightest desire to interfere in any way with Miss Coolidge's prospects. The occurrence of this evening was wholly unpremeditated as far as I am concerned. But, madam, I wish it distinctly understood upon my part, that if the insults to which I have been subjected tonight are ever repeated I shall consider my connection with you at an end."

Mrs. Coolidge could have strangled her as she stood there in her proud beauty, but she began to be a little afraid of her as well.

"Really, Miss Douglas, it seems to me you are assuming a great deal for a dependent," returned the woman haughtily.

"I recognize the fact, madam, that I am in a measure dependent upon your favor; but I am also aware that my services are of no small value to you. When I consented to take charge of your daughters' education, I did not consent to forfeit my self-respect by quietly submitting to any abuse from any member of your family."

Brownie's tone was very quiet, but very clear and firm.

"What am I to understand by this language from you, Miss Douglas?" demanded Mrs. Coolidge, nearly choking with anger.

"That I expect due consideration from yourself and family, while I in turn render you all proper respect. I wish you good night madam."

With a courteous inclination of her bright head, Brownie turned and walked from the room with the air of an empress.

Mrs. Coolidge stood looking after her for several minutes in utter amazement.

"Who is the little vixen I wonder?" she ejaculated, when she had recovered her self-possession somewhat. "She is evidently far above her station; and judging from her appearance tonight she must have moved in society equal to any into which we are received."

But that lady knew, as the young girl had said, that she was invaluable to her.

Already her younger daughters were acquiring a fluency of speech and an elegance of manner which delighted her, and she felt it would not do to part with her cultivated governess for any light consideration.

She knew it would be very difficult to find any one, while they were abroad, who would prove as useful in every respect as Miss Douglas, and she resolved to swallow her wrath, and keep her at all hazards, unless Wilbur should fall in love with her.

At all events, one thing was settled—Miss Douglas should be seen no more in company.

CHAPTER XIV.

ISABEL'S DISCOVERY.

A few days later Brownie donned her hat and jacket and went out for a stroll.

She had been very brave and defiant while confronting Mrs. Coolidge but the reaction followed immediately, and she had been sad and dispirited ever since.

She felt so alone in the world—so weary of this loveless life.

It was evident that she was looked upon as a mere machine, fit only to make herself obliging and useful.

To be sure, there had been no more unkind or insolent speeches, for Isabel had been warned by her mother that Miss Douglas was so extremely high-spirited that she would not submit to them; but their manner to her was so arrogant and overbearing that it was absolutely painful to be in their presence.

ldress MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THE housecleaning letters haven't begun to come in yet so we'll have to get along with those we have. It is only when the sisters are in the midst of the spring cleaning that ideas and inspirations for such letters come and then ey are usually too busy to write. However, the tters on hand pertain more or less to the spring ason, moving, flower culture, amusing children rainy days and doing things about the home, l as important in their way as the spring cleang. Letters about gardens interest me greatly r, of the two, a beautiful garden and well-kept rd gives pleasure to a greater number of people an a carefully kept room, for more people see . Maybe that isn't the right way of looking at , but it is comforting to flower lovers, and that eans most of us, so I'm thinking I won't be dged harshly. Tell us about your flower gar-n.—Ed.

EUREKA, P. O. BOX 550, CALIF.

EAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have just finished reading COMFORT and enjoyed much but must say that I like to see a comment of ours, no matter how short, at the end of each letter. I love babies, bless them, but would much prefer to e the writer's picture instead, or, as one sister id, another letter. For after all, the baby is more recious in mother's sight than in the sight of anyne else but she, no doubt, has oodles of his pictures t home so give us something else in place of so any strange baby faces, please. We can see plenty f them on the street. Now please do not censure e for I am a saint of the Lord and know what I ant. Please print helpful poetry and give a few ood prayers and table blessings instead of baby ictures. Babies are sweet but Christ worship is weeter and needful too in this sinful yorld as an xample to others. Mrs. Wilkinson is a dear soul ut maybe just a littie blind. No offense, but because the baby cries for the chandelier to play with o reason why he should get it. And if good pace be given for something not beneficial while eneficial things be barred for lack of space, what rofit have we? We would like a Bible quotation or erse at the beginning of the Sisters' Corner. Here s a verse and I will supply one each month if there s space to print it.

Yours in the Love and Admonition of Christ Jesus, ur Lord.

MRS. ALLIE CROWLEY.

Dear Mrs. Crowley.—If I were the sort of perion who could please and satisfy every woman reader of COMFORT I wouldn't be doing this work t all. Instead I'd be employed at a nice fat alary to settle all affairs of State, sort of an dvisor to the President or something like that. I ry to do the very best I can and to please as many as I can. So glad you noticed that I am just a little blind. I try to be that way—blind to the little faults and failings of my friends, though fully aware of their virtues.

The poem, "Royal Dainties," which you sent, will be printed at the close of this department and if you are kind enough to send more poems they will be printed if there is space for them, but please observe carefully all copyrights. Just to prove to you that we want to give each reader what she wants, inasmuch as it is possible, following this will be given several poems suitable for table blessings.

The idea of a Bible quotation from each reader is a good one. Stupid of me not to have thought of it before. Matthew, XIX chapter, and 14th verse is a favorite of mine.

"Heavenly Father, kind and good,
We thank Thee for our daily food;
O, may the strength it gives us be Used ever, Lord, in serving Thee."

"Be present at our table, Lord;
Be here and everywhere adored,
These mercies bless and grant that we May feast in Paradise with Thee."

"God bless this food, and bless us all,
And keep us safe, whate'er befall,
For Jesus' sake, Amen."

(Sent in by Esther M. Buhrman, Lantz, Md.)

"When all Thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys,
Transported with the view, 'm lost
In wonder, love and praise.
Ten thousand thousand precious gifts,
Our daily thanks employ,
Nor is the least a cheerful heart,
That tastes those gifts with joy."

Our Father, we thank Thee for this expression of Thy loving kindness to us. Guide us by Thy spirit into all truth and bring us to Thyself in Heaven, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

"Father we thank Thee for this food,
For all the blessings Thou dost give.
Strengthen our bodies and our souls,
And let us for Thy service live."

CAMDEN, R. R. 6, S. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years and it is needless to say I enjoy everything in it.

In a paper which I was reading a few days ago I came across the following headline: "97 per cent. of the city mothers vote they are willing for their daughters to marry farmers."

Now here is a question for discussion: Are 97 per cent. of the farm mothers willing for their sons to marry city girls? Is the average city girl capable of being a farmer's wife?

I doubt very much if some of those girls whose mothers vote they are willing for them to become farmers' wives, know how to pin on an apron. And, too, would they know how to tread the "street" to the garden, cow lot, poultry yard and like "streets" the farmers' wives must tread. Of course some may say, "let them learn," but will they be willing to learn after enjoying the pleasures of city life? From a general standpoint, the

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

MRS. Minnie O. Mackintosh, San Diego, 3932 Cleveland Ave., California, wins the COMFORT Sisters' Pin for the "best" recipe this month. The conditions of this contest have been explained in preceding numbers. Mrs. Mackintosh has been a contributor of recipes and poems for many years and we feel that the sisters will be glad that her efforts have been rewarded, even if only in a small way. Who is next?—Ed.

CREAM TOAST.—A perfectly cooked dish of cream toast is delicious. It is not worthwhile to serve such a dish unless it is well done. First, put into a double boiler a scant pint of rich milk and one teacup of cream; let it come to the boiling point then add a heaping tablespoon of fresh butter and a heaping tablespoon of flour (or a smaller one of arrowroot) wet in a little cream, season to taste with salt and let it boil up. Meanwhile toast slices of bread, two or three days old, brown evenly and if a little scorched, scrape off every particle. The slices should be of even size, neatly trimmed; then put two slices at a time into the sauce and as soon as they soften all through (it takes only a minute) transfer to oven or warming closet of the range. Pour a little sauce over each successive layer, going through the whole operation quickly. Serve the toast while it is very hot. When rightly made this is a dish to tempt a fasting saint. The sauce should be of the consistency of cream. Arrowroot is the most delicate thickening material that can be procured. It is more expensive than flour, however.—MRS. MINNIE O MACKINTOSH, San Diego, 3932 Cleveland Ave., Calif.

SPINACH.—Before washing spinach break the leaves from any hard stalks and remove all leaves that are yellowed or bitten. Put through several waters, always lifting out the spinach instead of draining as this washes the grit into the leaves again. Bring quickly to a boil without the addition of water. Turn several times and as soon as it is thoroughly cooking, set back closely covered and simmer fifteen minutes. Skim out into a colander and drain. Chop fine and season with butter and salt. Many like the addition of a few spoonfuls of thick cream. Garnish with hard-boiled egg cut in slices.

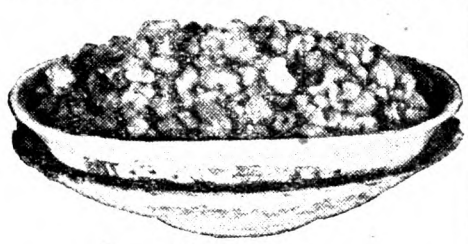
MACARONI AND ROUND STEAK.—One-half package macaroni, one-half can tomatoes, three tablespoons butter, two onions, salt and pepper to taste, one-half cup grated cheese, one pound round steak, one-half cup breadcrumbs. Break macaroni into inch lengths and add it with one tablespoon of butter to plenty of boiling water and boil twenty minutes, then drain. Put steak and onions through a food chopper. Put macaroni into buttered fireproof dish, then put in meat and onions, add seasonings, tomatoes, cheese, breadcrumbs, and remainder of butter melted. Bake in moderate oven one hour.

MEAT CAKES.—One pound round steak, three tablespoons melted butter, three small onions, one tablespoon chopped parsley, two eggs, one-fourth pound grated cheese, two cups breadcrumbs, salt, pepper, and paprika to taste, tomato sauce.

FOR SAUCE.—Four tablespoons butter, one carrot, one turnip, two onions, three tablespoons flour, two cupfuls stock, one can or one-half pound fresh tomatoes, one tablespoon tomato catsup, one bunch sweet herbs, salt, pepper, and red pepper to taste, one blade mace, one bay leaf.

FOR MEAT CAKES.—Grind steak and onions together, add butter, cheese, parsley, crumbs, seasonings, and eggs lightly beaten. Mix together; form into small cakes, roll in flour and fry in hot butter. Serve hot with tomato sauce.



FOR SAUCE.—Slice vegetables, fry in butter ten minutes; then add flour, stock, mace, bay leaf, tomatoes, catsup, and herbs. Stir until they boil, then simmer gently forty-five minutes. Rub through sieve, add seasonings and use. Sufficient for twelve meat cakes.

CREAMED POTATOES AU GRATIN.—Two tablespoons butter, one quart peeled and diced potatoes, two cups milk, one tablespoon flour, one cup grated cheese, one teaspoon salt, one-fourth teaspoon white pepper, few breadcrumbs. Cut potatoes in about one and one-half inch pieces, then boil carefully in boiling salted water. When done, drain, and pour into buttered baking dish. Blend butter and flour in saucepan over fire, add milk, stir till boiling, then add cheese and seasonings. Pour over potatoes; grate a little cheese over top, sprinkle with breadcrumbs and bake five minutes in hot oven. —MRS. HATFIELD, Manchester, N. H.

STEW WITH DUMPLINGS.—Two pounds lean beef, mutton or veal, one quart of potatoes, diced, two cups of sliced carrots (can be left out), two cups sliced onions (half this amount would do), one cup of tomatoes, one tablespoon of salt, one-quarter teaspoon pepper, one tablespoon flour, and two tablespoons chopped parsley. Wipe meat, cut into small pieces, put in kettle, cover with boiling water and let boil slowly for one and one-half hours. Add carrots and onions, boil fifteen minutes, then add potatoes, salt, pepper and tomatoes. Add boiling water if needed to cover vegetables, boil for thirty minutes, add dumplings and boil ten minutes without lifting cover. Add flour which has been mixed with a little cold water, pour over stew and sprinkle with parsley.

DUMPLINGS.—One cup of flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon shortening and cold water. Sift flour, baking powder and salt, rub in shortening lightly with finger-tips, add enough water to hold dough together and drop by spoonfuls into stew. Sometimes I add a cup of corn to stew and if I have plenty of eggs I add one egg to dumplings. We think this is fine.—MRS. G. L. SPANGLE, Six Mile Run, Pa.

HULLED CORN.—Cover with cold water two quarts of corn that has ripened and dried on the cob, add four rounding teaspoons of soda, stir well and let soak over night. Boil in the same water until the hulls have loosened. As the water boils away add more so that the corn will always be covered. Drain, and wash in cold water to remove the flavor of the soda, and at the same time rub off the hulls by working the corn through the water with the hands. Cover with fresh cold water and slowly cook until tender, changing the water one or more times. Hulled corn is served with milk, cream or syrup, or it may be warmed up in a little butter and served as a vegetable.

HEALTH BRAN COOKIES.—Three cups bran, one and one-half cup white flour, two-thirds cup milk, one and one-half teaspoon salt, one half cup white sugar, one-half cup shortening, two eggs, and two level tablespoons baking powder. Cream the shortening and sugar together, add the well-beaten eggs, then the milk gradually. Mix baking powder with flour and bran and add gradually to the above. If the dough cannot be handled, add more white flour. Roll out thin and cook with cooky cutter. Bake in quick oven from seven to ten minutes.

ORANGE MARMALADE.—Six oranges, three lemons. Cut ends from fruit and slice very thin. To every cup of sliced fruit add three cups of cold water and let stand twenty-four hours. Boil briskly forty-five minutes and let stand another twenty-four hours. Then to every cup of fruit and juice add one cup of sugar and boil forty-five minutes or until juice will hair when dropped from spoon. Do not use the thick white skins of the lemons. If Valencia oranges are used, add two cups of sugar.—MRS. E. H. STEED, Lyons, Colo.

The Perfect Chocolate Cake and how to make it

DO YOU KNOW of anything more delicious than a good, home-made chocolate layer cake? Here is one that is rich, delicate in flavor and not "sickishly sweet."

The secret in securing the rich, yet delicate flavor and fine even texture of this perfect cake lies in the selection of the best materials, and above all a high-grade cream of tartar baking powder like Royal. This last item makes a big difference, because Royal contains none but wholesome ingredients. It raises the cake perfectly—contains no alum—leaves no bitter taste.

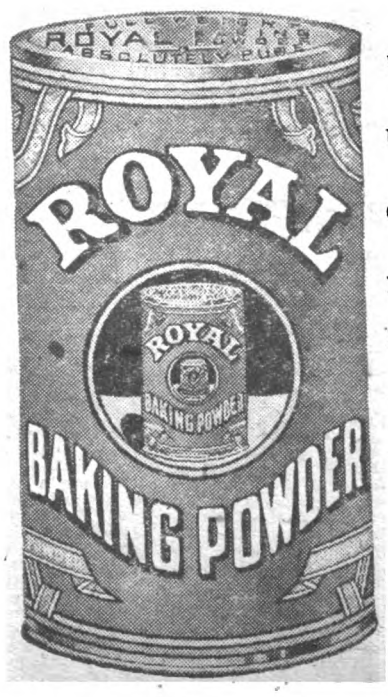
To make this perfect chocolate cake use this recipe—cut it out and paste it in your cook book.

CHOCOLATE LAYER CAKE

½ cup butter or other shortening
1 cup sugar
1 egg
1 teaspoon vanilla extract
1 cup milk
1¾ cups flour
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
¼ teaspoon salt

Cream shortening well; add sugar gradually beating well between each addition; add beaten egg, flavoring, one half the milk and mix well, add one half the flour which has been sifted with salt and baking powder, add remainder of milk, then remainder of flour, stirring well after each addition. Bake in three greased layer cake tins in moderate oven 15 to 20 minutes.

FILLING



2½ squares (2½ oz.) unsweetened chocolate
3 tablespoons cream
1 egg yolk
¾ cup powdered or confectioner's sugar
1 tablespoon cornstarch
⅛ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla extract

Save egg white for icing. Melt chocolate in top of double boiler; add cream and egg yolk; mix in sugar gradually; add cornstarch which has been mixed with a little cold water and cook, stirring constantly until smooth and thick; add salt and vanilla. Spread thickly between layers of cake.

ICING

1 unbeaten egg white
1¼ cups confectioner's sugar
1 teaspoon butter
1 tablespoon thin cream
1½ squares (1½ oz.) unsweetened chocolate

Melt chocolate; put egg white into shallow dish: add sugar gradually, beating with wire whip; add butter, melted chocolate and cream and beat well until of right consistency to spread.

Helpful Hints

Use level measurements for all materials. Save on the amount rather than the quality of the ingredients.

Use the very best vanilla and Royal Baking Powder; otherwise the delicate flavor and fine texture will be lost.

Cream the butter well before adding any sugar, and do all the hard beating at the beginning of the process.

Beat the egg yolks and whites together; this keeps the cake fresh longer.

Bread flour is intended; if pastry flour is used add about ¼ cup more flour.

A few grains of salt added to the icing brings out the flavor of the chocolate.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton, born rich, dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Upon her death there is left forty pounds a year. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; she has no faith in him, and finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis's. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman. He does not explain but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. She remodels a velvet dress sewn with amethysts for Mrs. Gibbs, who tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, hearing footsteps, and a whistle which reminds her of Lesard, listens, and with shoes in hand steals downf the stair-case and spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." With his words, "Promise to trust me whatever happens," ringing in her ears, she gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The masked ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband. With the guests at supper a robbery is committed. Mrs. Fareham's jewels, her grace's, too, are missing and only Gillian's jewel case left. Detectives arrive and Sir Charles Vivian's statements, as to his movements before the dinner, relieve him and Gill of suspicion. Requesting to see her maid and how she forgot the jewels, Gillian admits she was sick in bed and knew nothing about her not wearing them. The robbery breaks up the party, and Jacky, packing up, asks Gill what they are to do. It's done. If Gill tells all she knows she may find out Lesard is married before, and Jacky reads his last letter to Gill, and while loathing the man whom she believes has wronged both, she knows they are not strong and brave enough. Marchmont insists that Gillian shall appear at dinner and Jacky requests her not to ring, she is to sit with Mrs. Gibbs, and late in the evening she slips down-stairs, opens a door, standing behind it. She recognizes the voices of Lesard and Brookes and the latter calls "All clear," and she sees Marchmont, Brookes and Lesard who is bringing the jewels, which he carries in his belt, the stones removed by Marchmont and Lesard laying the canvas belt in the place uncovered. Struggling she gains the passage back, her hands bleeding. Gill meets her, hurrying her to safety and Jacky hears Brookes query why Lesard goes out the other way and what will prevent his coming back and taking it. Gillian goes to walk with Sir Charles Vivian and is joined by Jacky. She admits Jacky is her sister. Jacky discovers a flash of light. She has found the other way and someone is coming out from an opening in the wall which is well concealed by ivy and at the foot is a deep dark pool. It is Lesard. Jacky crawls in—the stones are undisturbed. Going out, she hears Gillian call, "Marchmont is back." He has seen the detective. Unless Lesard fails him he is safe. Gill and Jacky decide to get out at once. Jacky means to take the jewels. Lesard decides to have his share and starts for Hamilton Place. Jacky finds the jewels and is staggered by the weight. She fastens the belt around her body. In the collection is a necklace of stones clear and black. Not daring to have them in her possession, she wraps them up, putting them back, and piling the stones over them. She hears someone coming. It is Lesard.

CHAPTER XVI.

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

UP-STAIRS Gillian stood all ready for the start. She had copied a little map of the roads from the County Guide to use when they were out of the radius she knew. Sir Charles's ten-pound note was pinned inside the bodice of her dress; the small handbag was ready, with ample room for the jewels, but there was no sign of them or Jacky!

Gillian looked nervously at the clock. It was an hour and more since Jacky had left her; it was too long, but she would not let herself think anything had happened. Too anxious to sit down, she paced the floor feverishly, and presently remembered her father's papers, which they dared not leave. She went to get them and saw on the top of the case that slip of paper Jacky had scribbled.

"If I'm not back in an hour and a half, don't wait for me. Go straight to Sir Charles Vivian and tell him everything. He will help you, and I will join you sometime."

"Join you sometime!" The girl who had written it had meant after death and the grave, for if she were late it meant she had slipped and drowned. In sheer despair she had sent Gillian to the only man who might help her, so that she should not be alone at Hamilton Place. But the girl who read it was too sharp for her. The meaning of the note flashed on her, and her lips closed in a hard line, though her eyes were full of tears.

"I'll not go anywhere, if Jacky gets drowned for me, for that's what she means." Her thoughts seemed to fly in her brains. "What a fool I was to let her go alone! But she shan't die—she shan't." She had the lamp out and was in the passage through the red baize doors into Marchmont's part of the house as she spoke. But her light feet could not keep up with her heart, that had gone far ahead of her into that unknown passage where Jacky was. If only she had read that note first—the time was nearly up now!

Gillian's throat swelled with the thought of what might be happening to Jacky now, and at the unbidden vision of it she said something to herself just over a whisper.

"Wait, Jacky, dear, I'm coming! Don't go too far!"

For if Jacky could die, so could Gillian. She was standing at the side door almost before she knew it, having flown like a ghost through the silent house.

It was open wide to the rainy night, as Jacky had not left it. Gillian did not think of that as she stepped through it. But once outside, she stopped as if she had been shot. It was no accident that had stopped Jacky—it was worse! She had been caught!

For behind her rose the sound of muffled voices, furious, suspicious. Marchmont and the butler had come into the little hall by the curtained door from the other side of the house; they had a candle and she saw them plainly through the crack of the door.

Marchmont, scornful, unbelieving, but giving in to the will of his servant, Brookes, sickly white with exhaustion, his breath coming in gasps, his face steaming with rain and sweat.

"I tell you it's true," he panted. "I haven't trusted Lesard lately. I went over there tonight to warn him, and I caught him instead; and so did some one as well, or I'm off my head."

"You say he's here?" Marchmont interrupted angrily.

"I say that when I got there I saw a man hanging round, so I hid; and Lesard must have seen him, too, for the moment he was gone out came my gentleman; and he's there now, for I followed him every step of the way. If he's after any good, why is he down below?"—pointing. "He went in—I saw him; and if we're not quick we'll never see him nor the jewels again!"

He stamped his foot with impotent rage at the supineness of his partner. Conviction had not yet come to Mr. Marchmont.

"Slippery devil!" he said. "But, even so, he dare not go against me. More likely he's come to get out of the way of that London fool."

"So he lights a lantern and lets it shine till I saw it when I was on the wall! Damn you, Marchmont, have you no sense?" He brought his hand down with a hopeless gesture and dropped his candle.

"Be good enough to be quick, and look out what you're doing," said Marchmont furiously. "Go and get another light and follow me down into the cellar; we'll soon find out who's right—you or I!"

He turned, careless of the darkness, to the kitchen stairs. Brookes was left to grope his way back again to the lighted hall.

Gillian, with a queer calmness, as if she were doing the most ordinary thing in life, stepped after Marchmont. She could see him striking matches all the way down the stairs. She was close behind him as he got a candle out of the kitchen, but out of sight by means of a friendly doorway. She saw by his fast disappearing light that she was close to the foot of the stairs; also that a loose iron bar was on the door that hid her. It was a flat, strong thing, not very heavy, and without a tremor of a pulse she took it from the stay that held it.

If Marchmont and Lesard were to set on Jacky together they would be better without Brookes; he was viciously cruel from cowardice. If Jacky had managed to hide, and the two men quarreled, they could fight fair—without Brookes.

She stood quietly behind the jamb of the open door and waited.

The quasi butler hurrying down-stairs with one hand in front of his candle to shield it, saw nothing ahead of him but fleeting shadows. He saw nothing still when a deadly pain caught him across the knees and sent him to the floor from the second step of the stairs in a sprawling leap. Gillian heard the dull crash of his fall, the thud of his head on the flagged passage. After that not a sound, not even breathing.

Was he dead? She did not care; he was out of the way.

His matches and candle had fallen to the ground; she groped for them on her knees until she found them. The man never stirred as she lit his own candle and went on, leaving him lying on his face. He was one less to murder Jacky; that was all.

As she neared the wine-cellar she pinched out her light lest Marchmont might be waiting for Brookes. But the place was dark, there was no one there, and only a cold rush of air in her face told her the queer tunnel was open. How had he managed to move the stone? It had taken three of them the night Jacky had followed.

That was the very thing that had finally roused Marchmont's unwilling suspicion. The stone that had been so cumbersome was on the floor; only the wine-bin hid the gaping hole into the tunnel. There was something wrong, and, to do him justice, Marchmont was no coward. If Brookes had been with him he could have explained the mystery. He had spent the afternoon carefully easing the fit of the stone that blocked the aperture and had extracted it with a crowbar. But the early arrival of Marchmont himself from Wellford House had alarmed him. He pulled the wine-bin in front of the hole and went up-stairs, locking the door behind him and carrying with him the evening's supply of wine, as a good butler should. In his sudden distrust of Lesard he had forgotten all about the stone, that he had made fit loosely, because he foresaw that if ever there were trouble it would be his part to get the jewels and run. And in that event there would be no three men handy to be lifting stones.

But Brookes lay by the kitchen stairs concerning himself with nothing.

Mr. Marchmont, apprehensive of trouble from the only event of the day that was meaningless, crept through the open hole. He had been gone long enough for his light to be out of sight when Gillian reached the place.

There was determination in her face as she lit her own candle for just long enough to be sure of the way to get in the opening. For once she looked like Jacky as she blew out the tiny flame and slipped like a cat into the darkness of the square windowlike aperture. Even the slimy wall, the running water, did not stagger her; almost confident, she strolled down the passage, for it was two against two now. She put forcibly from her mind the thought of Lesard's great strength; nothing mattered if she could only find Jacky. But where, where was she?

Where, indeed?

Alone with the man she had loved, separated from him only by that bar of rock that presently he would saunter up to, and conscious that she dared not trust in his mercy or his honor for one second if he found her.

"And he will find me, for that's why he came in!"

She thought dully, as if it were some one else's affair, not hers. She did not even trouble as to whether he could hear her breathing or not. Sooner or later she would see his face, insolent and mocking, leaning over the ridge that hid her. But the seconds turned to minutes and the man did not move. Then a sound she knew was loud in the stillness—he was lifting the stones—the stones off the jewels—and half those jewels were round her own waist!

"He is making sure what I've taken!" At the thought she quivered, wondering if he would kill her when he knew what she had done.

"Well, I'm damned!"

The slow, unbelieving exclamation rang through the place, and told her her hour was come.

Very softly she raised herself a little, for at least she would not meet him crouching; but he made no movement toward her. She could hear him fumbling among the things that remained as if he could not believe his own eyes.

Suddenly he gave an angry little laugh, like a snarl.

"Marchmont," he said softly. "Marchmont has 'marked the king'! And I'm left!" He laughed again. "Not by a long chalk, if I know it," he muttered just over his breath. She heard him handling something that rattled. "Not by that, and by that!"

Open-mouthed, the listener leaned against her slimy shelter.

He had said Marchmont! Then he could not have seen her light, or suspect her; he had come only as she had done—to steal. If she lay quite still would he go away without suspicion? Would she yet live to look on the sky again?

She was more frightened now in her uncertainty than she had been when she was hopeless. She tried to pray for help, but nothing would come to her mind but two words:

"God—dear God!"

She thought them frantically over and over, and as she did a new sound caught her sharpened senses.

Steps were coming down the passage from the cellar, and Lesard did not hear them.

The awful thought that it might be Gillian come to look for her came over her, till she remembered Gillian never could have moved that stone.

"Well, Lesard!" said the sardonic voice, so close at her elbow that she was certain Marchmont saw her. "May I ask what you're doing here?"

"I'm doing just what you've done," coolly. "Looking after the stuff. What did you do," insultingly, "with what you took?"

"Took! What do you mean?" Marchmont moved hastily to the displaced stones. "What foolishness are you talking, and what right have you to sneak in like this? How do you know who's outside looking at your light? Brookes told me he could see it."

"Brookes told you that, did he?" Lesard's voice was very quiet, but one hearer at least felt the danger in it. "Well, it was a lie. Don't you see I'm in my shirt? My coat's in one slit, my waistcoat in the other. I'm obliged to Brookes, but I'll settle with you first. Get that belt and give me my share, or—well, you'd better get it!" significantly.

"What belt? Isn't it there? You're mad!"

Marchmont's voice was all but a scream of fury. He bent over the half-empty hiding place as Lesard had done, and, like a man struck with madness, scrabbled in the hole with his hands.

Lesard laughed.

"Isn't it there? By —— that's good—from you! When did you take it, or did you let that shivering fool Brookes get it?"

But Marchmont, quite changed from the precise, annoyed, superior person he had been a moment ago, had risen to his feet with a furious ejaculation.

"If any one has it, it's you!" he cried savagely, and so quickly that even Lesard was caught unprepared. He seized him round the waist with both hands, feeling for the belt. Lesard jerked him off almost without an effort, but just an instant too late. Marchmont had felt a hard, bulging packet under his shirt.

"You've got it," he said as he went staggering backward almost to the ledge of rock. "Give it to me and I share it with you—and then be rid of a snivelling liar."

"That's enough!" Lesard's voice was low now. "You're talking rot, and you know it. I haven't got the belt—I've got better! You've come to your wretched belt. I always said you were in that black diamond business, but you did show such a clear slate, and so know." He pulled something from under his and dangled it in his partner's face. "Do these? If you do you'd better take a good look them, for you won't see them again."

Jacky expected an outburst from Marchmont, but for a long moment he was absolutely When he answered it was with such a that the words seemed to creak in his throat.

"My black diamonds," he said slowly, cleverest bit of work that I ever did to you."

"Exactly." The mocking devil in Lesard seemed to have sobered Marchmont, for he with sudden frankness.

"Lesard, I give you my honor, I never that belt! If you don't know where it is, Put that necklace back and I'll share all of the stuff with you, whether you have or not. My luck is in that necklace."

Lesard laughed.

"My luck's in it now!" he retorted. "As the belt, I came to take my share of it. My share mind you—no more. I'm sick of going round here, and that detective's gone. But as you or Brookes have been before going to square it with this. I don't care which of you has the belt, now!"

"Neither of us has it. Send for the man and ask him."

Marchmont was trembling where he stood, not with terror.

"Shakespeare, by George!" said Lesard, a shrug. "But I'm not sitting the gallery see? I'm playing the star. And I would lieve one word you or your precious pal say even on your honor!" with an unpleasant "And these will pay me well for your game about the others." He flicked the black necklace so that it gave out shivers of green and red fire, and in the case showed a brilliant point of white luster in center of each dark stone.

"It was a low trick to annex these," he lazily, "and you deserve to lose them."

Marchmont turned his head a little. heard Brookes coming down from the cellar slow the man was—did he expect him to with Lesard alone! He slipped his hands his trousers pockets, and the right one something. Yet still he did not answer. thinking of a trick he had learned in his youth—a trick he had kept bright by practice indoors and out. In South America had killed a horse on the run with it. And was standing still.

"If you take my diamonds I'll give you he said at last.

"You can't," returned Lesard simply. ruin yourself and not get me. I'm off regards to Brookes, and I'll settle with my convenience. By the way, Billy won't without me, so you'd better get two new while you're about it." He threw back and looked at Marchmont with amused then turned round nodding farewell.

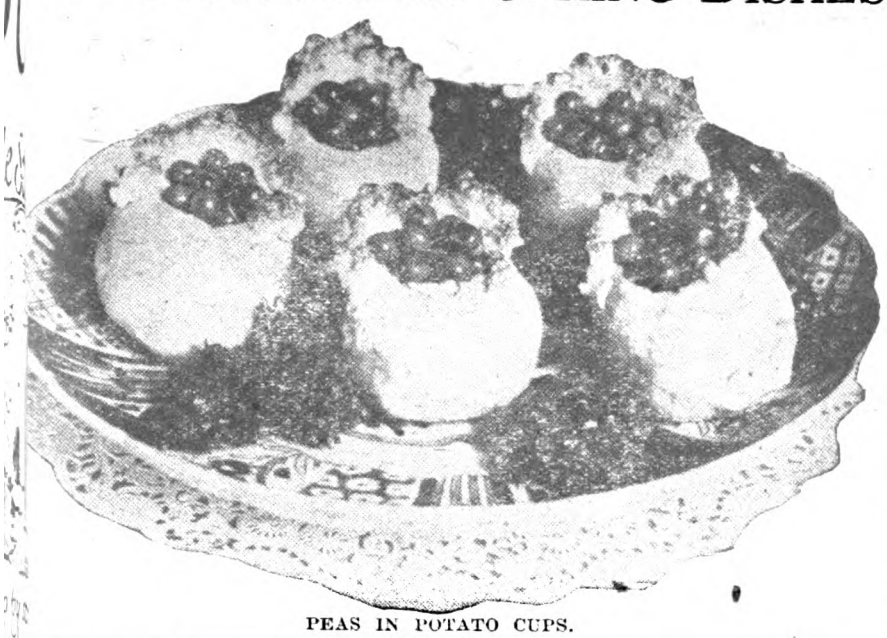
"You move another step and I'll kill you!"

There was real meaning, real menace, sharp warning, but Lesard never even turned head. He knew Marchmont never carried volver, and tonight was certain he had not the man was small and his evening clothes quisitely fitting that they would have shown once where he carried a pistol. Mr. Lesard all his jeering, had sharply inspected every of his opponent's figure as he stooped over hole in the floor.

"I don't think so," he returned indifferently for the only thing in Marchmont's power was rush him into the black stream, and that lacked weight to do. Still smiling, Lesard on, bracing himself a little to meet the attack that might come from behind.

But it did not come. Marchmont's head stead came out of his pocket—he wheeled he stood; there was a peculiar short whizz in air and a furious oath from Lesard, who his right hand gripping something that stood the point of his left shoulder.

Marchmont had thrown a knife such as sack herders wear. The quick whistle as sheered through the air had been all that kept it from Lesard's heart; he had ducked always just in time.



And now his face was the face of a devil, trace of humanity and decency wiped off it was the real Lesard who stood staring at blood that soaked his shirt, holding that his hand. The pain, the sight of his own maddened him. He looked at Marchmont, was so quiet that Jacky, who had been expecting the report of a revolver after Marchmont's throw, thought it had been bravado.

But Marchmont, who could see him, turned run. There was the quick sound of a leap, a queering noise that Jacky did not comprehend, and then a screeching cry that made her jump her feet. Only for the height of her ridge of rock Lesard must have seen her.

Sick and shaking, she fell back against the wall. What had been done? What had made Marchmont give that dreadful cry like a dying beast? Had Lesard killed him? Did she hear him moan now, or was it her fancy? She was half-fainting with the horror of what she could not see. The silence after that cry was awful—and where was Lesard? Was she to stand by and see killing, as she had stood by and seen Nearly fill the pan with parsnips, add a poon of sugar and a light sprinkling of salt and keep turning in the fat until the parsnips are well covered. Pour in about one cup of boiling water, cover closely and set back where the parsnips will steam cook. Frequently turn the parsnips from the bottom with a knife. When done they are brown and have a jelly-like coating. Add a little more water if necessary but they must not be wet when done.

PEAS IN POTATO CUPS.—Rice hot freshly boiled potatoes and to three cups add one-third cup of grated cheese, three tablespoons of butter, salt to taste, a little cayenne, three well-beaten egg yolks and enough thick cream to handle. Do not get the potato too wet. Beat until light. Shape into cups, fill with drained hot canned peas and place in the oven until a golden brown. Dot the peas with butter and serve at once.

CHICKEN GUMBO.—Old fowl can be used in this dish. Skin and clean the chicken and cut into serving pieces. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and roll in flour and sear in salt pork fat until a light brown. While doing this keep the meat turning so that it will not harden. Remove the chicken and in the same fat fry three sliced onions until brown. Cut one can of okra into thick slices. In an agate kettle that covers closely, or in an aluminum baker, lay the chicken, then the fried onion and okra. Mix two even tablespoons of flour with one and one-half teaspoons of salt, a little white pepper and a dash of cayenne, stir smooth with a little cold water and then add to two cups of thick canned tomato. Pour this into one quart of boiling water, stir and pour over the chicken mixture. Four seeded green peppers and a little parsley should be added if obtainable. Cover and cook for hours in a very slow oven if fowl is used.

CHILI CON CARNE.—One pound of lean beef from the rump or round cut into pieces about two inches long and one-third as thick. Slice one large onion and mince two cloves of garlic. Put three tablespoons of beef fat into a stew-pan and when hot add the meat, onion and garlic. Keep constantly turning until the meat is a golden brown. Sprinkle with three even tablespoons of chile powder and add one quart of boiling water. Bring to a boil and then set where it will slowly simmer for two and one-half hours. Add one pint of raw or thick canned tomato and season with salt. Thicken by blending three tablespoons of bubbling butter with three of dry flour and pouring slowly into it about one pint of the cooking liquor from the kettle, stir thoroughly and return all to the kettle. Continue the very slow cooking until the meat is tender but not so long as to cause it to separate.

FISH WITH EGG.—Pick salt codfish into shreds, cover with lukewarm water and soak until it is freshened to taste. Drain, cover with fresh lukewarm water, very slowly bring to a simmer and keep at the bubbling point twenty minutes. Drain. Put one tablespoon of butter in a saucepan and when it bubbles, smooth in one tablespoon of dry flour. Cook one minute and slowly add one cup of fresh milk, constantly stirring. Add one cup of prepared fish and bring to the cooking point. Into individual dishes put a layer of the creamed fish, then carefully drop a raw egg and dot with bits of butter and a dash of cayenne. Cover with more fish, sprinkle lightly with cracker-crumbs and brown in a hot oven. Serve at once. This is an excellent way to use leftovers of fish. If desired, a layer of mashed potato can be first placed in the dishes.

CREAMED DRIED BEEF WITH SPAGHETTI.—Pull one-fourth pound of dried beef into small pieces. Boil spaghetti. In a sauce-pan melt two tablespoons of butter and cream into it one tablespoon of dry flour, and gradually add one cup of rich cold milk. Simmer five minutes, add the beef and when boiling hot pour over the spaghetti. Creamed salmon may be prepared in the same way and poured over hot boiled rice or mashed baked potatoes.

CREAMED CANNED ASPARAGUS.—Melt three tablespoons of butter in a saucepan and smooth in three level tablespoons of flour. Add one and one-half cup of milk gradually, stirring continuously. Cook about three minutes, then add one-third cup of grated cheese and a little salt and pepper. Add one can of asparagus tips after draining well, and when thoroughly heated pour onto slices of hot buttered toast.

Not So Bad this Month

"Now, that's better! It's the first time the expense figures haven't given me a horrid feeling.

"If I'd only known sooner about Jell-O and some of the other money savers, I'm sure I'd have more dollars and not be so near wrinkles.

"What a lot of money and time I've wasted on things to eat when

JELL-O

America's Most Famous Dessert

would have helped me out."

Every woman who wants to know how Jell-O can "help her out" will learn how in the recipes below and in the Jell-O Book, which will be sent free to all who send name and address.

So many delightful things are made of Jell-O that it is impossible for any woman to know about all of them. But every woman can possess the recipes for the newest and best of the special Jell-O dishes.

The recipes following are of this class. Take the Pineapple Bavarian Cream for example:

Marion Harland was one of the first of the great cooks to discover that Jell-O—whipped exactly as cream is whipped—forms the ideal base for all forms of Bavarian Creams. Almost any kind of fruit can be stirred into the whipped Jell-O, just as the pineapple is in the recipe below. With comparatively little effort and little expense any woman can make Bavarian Creams of Jell-O that she could never hope to equal in any other way. Berries, peaches, cherries and prunes can be used instead of the pineapple specified in the recipe.

No sugar, cream or eggs are used in these delightful dishes, but only whipped Jell-O and fruit juices (the fruit itself only when particularly desired.)

Pineapple Bavarian Cream

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half pint of boiling water and add a half pint of juice from a can of pineapple. When cold and still liquid whip to consistency of whipped cream. Add a cup of shredded pineapple if you wish. Serves from 9 to 12 persons. Whipped cream adds to richness of the dessert, but it is not necessary.

Use a Dover egg beater for whipping Jell-O, and whip it just as you whip cream—only be sure you do not wait till Jell-O begins to set before you whip it.

Jappy Jell-O Compote

Pour a half cup or cup of peach juice into a pint measure; fill with water, let come to boiling point, and dissolve a package of Lemon or Orange Jell-O in it. Add one cup of cooked rice (cold). Pour half into a dish or individual moulds and set away to harden. Place six or seven halves of peaches on the jellied rice and cover with the remainder of the rice. Serve with meat course, or for dessert as you choose.

Olive Jell-O Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half pint of boiling water. Add half-pint can of tomato soup, one cup finely chopped celery and twelve olives chopped. Salt to taste. Set away to harden.

Glorified Rice

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half pint of boiling water. Add one-half pint of canned pineapple juice or any fruit-juice. When a cold liquid, whip to the consistency of heavy whipped cream. Have two cups of cold boiled rice cooked dry. Fold the rice into the whipped Jell-O. Add one cup whipped cream, four tablespoonfuls sugar, and salt to taste. Set in a cold place to harden.

The whipped cream may be omitted and the Glorified Rice will still be a most delicious dish. Whipped Jell-O, alone or in combination with fruit, is so good that it is seldom necessary to add cream to it.

Imperial Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and one tablespoonful vinegar. Just as Jell-O begins to set, add one small can sliced pineapple, one-half can Spanish pimentos, shredded, and one sliced cucumber. Serve with cream salad dressing.

New Manhattan Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and one tablespoonful vinegar. When slightly stiffened add one cup each of chopped celery and apple, one cup English walnut meats broken in pieces and sprinkled with salt. Cool in individual moulds; serve on lettuce with mayonnaise or French dressing.

The New Jell-O Book

The new Jell-O Book, just out, is more beautiful and complete than any other ever issued, and it will be sent free to any woman furnishing her name and address.

Jell-O is put up in six pure fruit flavors: Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Chocolate.

Cubby Bear at the Fire

By Lena B. Ellingw

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

GRANDMA Bear stood in the doorway one autumn day, shading her eyes with one paw, and looking first in one direction, then another.

"What are you looking for, Grandma Bear?" asked Cubby. "If you have lost something, I will help you to find it."

"I am thinking how dry everything is. We have had no rain for a long time. See how the fallen leaves rustle under your paws, and how dry all the little twigs are. You should pick up some dry sticks for kindling wood, Cubby Bear."

"Y-yes," answered Cubby. "Perhaps tomorrow—but I have promised to play a game of tag now with Racky Coon and Shinyblack Crow, by the white birches near Bunny Rabbit's house."

Cubby ran along the forest path toward the white birches. Racky and Shinyblack were waiting for him, and they had a fine game of tag.

"One, two three,
Can't catch me!"

shouted Cubby, and started to run from one birch tree to another, when he nearly fell over Bunny Rabbit, who was hurrying along, pale-faced and terrified.

"Better run home!" Bunny warned them. The farmhouse children are coming this way. Listen, and you can hear their voices." Having given this warning, Bunny rushed on, and into his little house, not waiting for an answer.

Sure enough, borne on the brisk autumn breeze, came the sound of children's happy laughter.

"Shall we run?" asked Cubby.

"You may, if you like, answered Racky, "but I shall stay and watch them. I can keep out of their way, but I am curious to see what they are coming for."

"Maybe they are looking for nuts," guessed Cubby.

Shinyblack Crow flew up in a tree, and the others hid among some little evergreen trees and watched the children as they came in sight.

First came two boys one carrying an armful of unhusked corn, the other a pailful of potatoes. Following them were three little girls, the largest one with a basket on her arm. As she walked, dishes could be heard rattling in the basket.

"I believe those children are going to have a picnic," whispered Racky.

The five children stopped under one of the white birches, and put down their corn, potatoes and basket.

"Dear me! I hope they won't notice Bunny Rabbit's little house!" whispered Cubby. "How frightened Bunny will be, having them so near!"

They gathered some little sticks, which they piled over some scraps of birch bark, then some larger sticks. The biggest boy took a match from his pocket, lighted it, and started the fire. Picking up stones from the ground, they placed them all around the fire for safety, to keep it from spreading.

They bustled about happily, putting their corn and potatoes to roast, while Cubby and Racky were so interested they could hardly keep out of the children's sight, among the little evergreens.

The girls spread a cloth on the ground, set out the dishes, and unpacked sandwiches and cookies.

"Oh, how good those things look," whispered Cubby. "I'd like to eat some of them right now."

Dinner time came, potatoes and corn were carefully taken from the fire, and with much laughter and merry talk the children ate.

"See, see," said Racky softly, "the black streaks they are getting on their funny little white faces!"

When the last of their dinner was eaten, the boys put more wood on the fire, and made a fine blaze, while the girls packed the basket. One of them caught up the white cloth and shook off the crumbs.

"O-oh!" cried Cubby, too excited to whisper. "See—she got too near the fire, and the nice cloth is all ablaze!"

Screaming, the child threw the tablecloth on the ground, and ran to a safe distance away. The cloth was of cotton, and flared up briskly. Little flames ran from it, catching at dry leaves, grass and twigs.

The boys tried manfully to stamp and beat out the fire, but while they overcame it in one place, it spread in another.

"This is no time to be hiding!" Shinyblack Crow called. "These children will not harm you now. Help them, before it is too late to save our Pleasant Forest! I will fly for more help."

So saying, Shinyblack Crow spread his wings and flew away, while Cubby Bear and Racky Coon left their hiding-place and ran to the spreading fire.

"Get some big sticks and try to beat out the flames!" Racky told Cubby.

The little girls ran away, toward home, sobbing with excitement and fright.

"Cubby Bear, Cubby Bear, Cubby Bear!" called a shrill little voice, and Chirpy Chipmunk leaped to Cubby's shoulder. "Come, come quickly! Bunny Rabbit's house is on fire! Save the Bunny Babies!"

ONE WAILING BUNNY BABY AFTER ANOTHER WAS PASSED TO CUBBY UNTIL ALL WERE OUTSIDE.

Sure enough, when Cubby turned to look, he saw that the cruel flames were lapping at Bunny's little house like hungry tongues, eating it up.

Running to a window at the back of the house, for the fire blocked the doorway, Cubby threw it open and looked in. There was Bunny Rabbit, trying to put his arms around all the Bunny Babies at once.

"Bunny Rabbit, Bunny Rabbit!" shouted Cubby. "Pass your babies up to me, one at a time!"

"Wake up, Bunny Rabbit," cried Chirpy. "Do you want to stay here till it is too late to get out?"

Poor Bunny, whimpering and trembling, moved slowly toward the window, bringing his little flock with him.

One wailing Bunny Baby after another was passed to Cubby until all were outside. Then, reaching inside, Cubby pulled Bunny Rabbit out, too.

Cubby packed the Bunny Babies into their little cart.

"Now, Bunny Rabbit," he said, "take them to Mamma Bruin's house, and go as fast as ... Oh, Chirpy Chipmunk, you will have ... him! He is frightened quite out of his ... Mamma Bruin to come here, quickly."

YESTERDAY I stopped in to see Mrs. Webster whose youngest boy, John Frederick, has just been getting over a bad attack of tonsilitis. Johnny is well enough now so that his big Irish-blue eyes were able to shine above one of ranges I carried him. "Now it's school for me next week, Uncle Lisha," he said a juicy voice and a dripping grin—and I t quite sure whether he was glad or sorry, ow he might have balanced in his small mind the, to him, almost equal evils of als and a sore throat. But despite a trace iti-scholasticism, John Frederick is a good nd one of my neighborhood favorites. Even regards him favorably.

er Johnny and I had our visit, I talked for minutes to Mrs. Webster's father—an old with little to say, but whose silence is that perience. He has wisdom when he cares to ly distribute it. For years Jim Webster a truck farmer on Long Island, selling the cultivated acres and moving into the city, his wife died and the children had all mar-

And I'll say for him that he bears the city ntly—even when the crowds he meets are as as ever were unthinned onions on his Long d fields in his trucking days.

rch being at hand, I spoke of the weather, urse, and of the succession of wet dark days ere having. "I gave myself a nifty umbrella Christmas, Mr. Webster," I said, "and I've carrying it so much that it's half worn out dy."

e old man took his pipe from his mouth and slowly: "It's the wind that will have to be gin'," he said. And then more emphatically: can't have good weather without the right "

I said good by to Johnny, kissing him below ig eyes, and went down-stairs to the street, im Webster's phrase about "the right wind" in my mind. "Yes," I said to myself as I ted my umbrella to the prevailing sweep of "it's the right wind, the right direction, we for good weather of any sort—and for clear and years of our own."

r if ever there was a gusty time, with the ght of men without direction and veering like weathercocks, it is now. And as a result we our world have only darkness in which we ble more or less—as we walk onward with no cular end chosen or any course set. The most erous part of the whole business is that so have seemingly ceased to care if they arrive here in their compassless lives, and doubt if t course or right wind is possible.

is is the time of the individual rampant—on the rampage. The new teaching is "no ssion." There is to be no guidance even for oungest child. Instinct and tendencies must free play or the individual be cramped and d in self-expression, this exploitation of the which is held to be so necessary by the doc- es of the new psychology. Any theory of dered, a directed life, guided by any stand- harnessed to any star save a self-planetary is sneered down by these new analysts—and y religious standard of living, any ideal of spirit is set up, it meets with contemptuous from those whose gods are their own and faith is only in themselves.

o much of this dangerous teaching may rep- t reactions of the Great War and how much may be reflections of continental importa- s of thought, I will not try to say to you. It suffices that the teaching, the tendencies th results are before us. They pervade our ges and universities, capturing youth too ily; they speak from our press and periodi- with a stamp of ruin they touch our pres- lay work of youthful creative thought. At moment our standards of art are being taken what in the past has been considered the d nt side of European self-expression—the xpression of those emotionals and weaklings se adjustments to their fellows have been t ill-made, and whose undirected lives have evil and unhappy to themselves, to others, in the effect of the art product left behind n. The sanity, the simplicity, the great re- us impulse underlying all great art, and which t always underly it, have been lost in a med- of unguided, unhealthy emotional reactions ing any beauty, vision or power that might the souls of men as all great art of the past done so finely and surely.

o any of the youth whom I love and who may d this, I want to say as earnestly as I may the great ones of our world, those who have ded the best we have in art or in any aspect ivilization have all been men of ordered, self- cted, upward-looking lives. They have been on whom the right wind of high soul-purpose blown serenely and creatively from the hills God. They were men to whom the stars were strangers blurred by cigarette smoke and the e of alcohol. They have never lost their way in a mass of injurious and artificially-builded efs—alien to either Nature or the Power that behind the beautiful visible world in which walk for a little while. They have been men aith and high hope in an underlying Spirit be- d themselves, giving them strength to over- e the world, guide their courses here, and not ving them to veer with every fickle wind of tions and instincts which must be naturally ish, unsocial, and destructive to themselves d others.

do not want to preach any doctrine of per- tion or that we need go back to the old re- ssions of Puritanic days, although I would like strange-adjectived waders and dabblers in udo-art and imported psychology to remember t it was these perhaps too stony souls who re strong enough to subdue according to their als a new land, and to lay the beginnings of great country in which these European ideas w seek to flourish. And they only flourish isonously because our growth in wealth, our xed population and our industrial civilization ve formed a softer social soil in which they ve taken root—a soil fitter for weaker souls d the teachings and forms of decay that have led other civilizations through all the years of tory.

For order in thought, belief in more than our- lves, a spiritualizing of our national life, the ild faith-directed and will-purposed early in life d in the home, all these are necessary today if r civilization is not to go the ways of those of e past. Without vision we perish. To the rth man belongs if he cannot erect himself above mself. There are few great dreams dreamed to- y. Our new teachers sound no great note—ey have none to sound but the pipings of a lse freedom. They sing only for themselves and r the shortened season of their little lives.

Without a right direction, a right wind, we can have nothing but cloudy world weather and the sort of fitful, dark lives that are being lived by many today. It is possible for a continuation of this to breed a great storm bringing destruction and clearing—a clearing which fewer of us might be here to enjoy—including the present upholders of the new psychology and the deriders of old faiths.

I would ask daily to be made as simple in my love of and faith in life as little Johnny Webster, and that I could turn as trustful, happy eyes on the future and those about me as he can turn. There is no Kingdom of Heaven but to those who are as children. The sophistication, the "impudent knowningness" of our day brings its own destruction and its pride will become its own fall.

And now for the letters:

619 E. Beaver Ave.,
State College, Pennsylvania.

Dear Uncle Lisha and Cousins:

Hello, everybody! Well, here I am again. Oh, I know I come quite often, but I just can't help it. Have to do something out of the ordinary sometimes.

I have started on my pilgrimage through the United States again. Contrary to my plans, I did not get clear of Penn's Woods the first jump. But I'm gradually working my way along. I've covered a goodly portion of Pennsylvania already. I'm now working here in the State College for an indefinite time at my trade—carpentering. By the time this letter is published I expect to be in Florida where I, will, no doubt, spend the winter. My destination is Miami. From there I expect to backtrack to Iowa and then westward, taking in the Western States. Of course my plans may necessarily change somewhat; for instance, I may hit such a bombardment of powder puffs I may be forced to turn back! But be that what it may, I'll get through somehow. I did not intend to start this trip this fall, but I got an invitation from dad to "beat it" and I accepted the invitation. So now I find the first lap of my trip completed.

I go from here in every direction on auto tours—some trips extending 200 miles and back. Nothing like knowing one's home state, y'know! In the nine or ten weeks I've been traveling I've been through a hundred of Pennsylvania's cities and towns. This city, State College, is noted mostly for its flappers, bachelors and college. Many thousands of students go here and different branches are taught the year 'round. Living is mighty high and boarding places scarce. I've visited some of the cousins (girls as well as boys) and was royally entertained—in spite of my notoriety! I expect to visit thousands more on my travels. I know many are eager to see what a man of my sort looks like. To those who will never see me, I'll say: you'll only see an ordinary fellow, generally quiet looking, but one that can easily smile or start some fun. Still see now and then a letter mentioning my name. Guess most of the cousins have come to realize that I'm not such a hard-baked fellow after all.

I mix very little in society here. Generally am in my room writing or out in the car nights and Sundays. Work nine hours a day. Have made several friends while here, of both sexes, but have only one close friend—a man who is a dandy fellow. We generally travel together and he seems to like my company better than anybody else. I'm that way with him and so we have our own crowd and have fine times in the car.

I'm still getting lots of letters, but very few of them condemn me for my stand toward the latest styles—powder, etc. I can still assure you I hold the same opinions. I don't get a bit scared at these flappers—even though I do get nearly smothered with powder. I mind my own business and let others mind theirs. Except for lecturing someone once in a while in a friendly way, it's not my business to be a reformer. But I'm always willing to point out what I think is the right way, and help anyone to get started that way. I am always a friend of the "under dog," and I will not condemn a person because of having fallen—rather I try to help them on their feet again. I'm sure it's the only way. Shun a person who has fallen, and he or she will sink lower, and lack the courage to climb back. The thing to do is to reach out a helping hand and they'll strive to regain their footing. Am I not right, Uncle? Perhaps some day you or I might yield to temptation (it always strikes us when we are weakest), and wouldn't we be grateful for a helping hand? So I say; "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

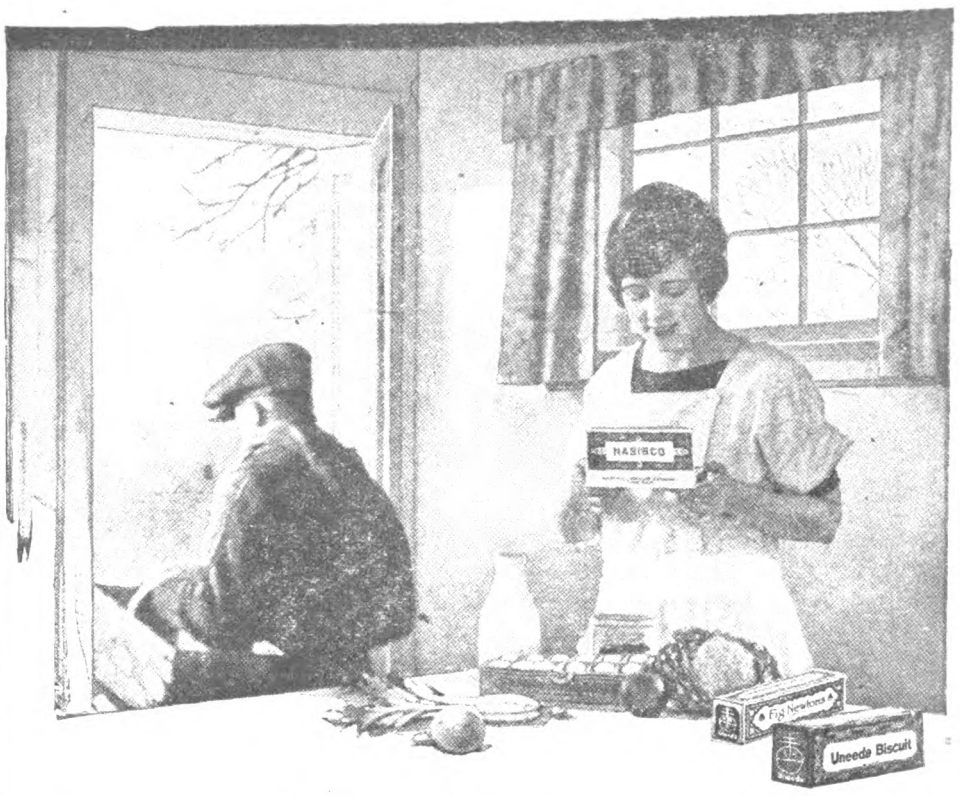
Many conceived the idea that because I denounced the use of cosmetics, criticized the latest styles, etc., that I am a "hick" and a kicker who kicks at everything just for the sake of kicking. But no one realizes more than I do the state the world is in today. While we are gaining in riches we are losing in morality. Losing in morality means losing in vitality. Lose in vitality—and what are you? A wreck, no good to yourself or others, a mere derelict on the sea of life. Late hours, society, fashion—all lead to this. Are we going to go on and on without a struggle, or are we, some of us at least, going to try and stem the tide and work for the uplifting of our people? Think that over. I must close.

Ever the same, Augustus H. Trick.

Well, Gus, old timer, when you see this in print you will be well started on your tour—probably leaving behind you a trail of exploding powder puffs like a smoke screen of fragrant talcum. I have a slogan for the banner of your pilgrimage—how would this do?

Come one, come all!
The puff shall fly
From each pink nose
Before I die!

But I should not kid you, Gus, for your letters, every one of them, bespeak an earnestness of purpose, a sincerity of endeavor, which are not found in much of our world of idle-minded, drifting youth. No, Gus, you are out to get somewhere and to have an interesting time while on the way. Under your red hair is not the weakness of brain steering-gear which will ever leave you, to use your own words, "a mere derelict on the sea of life." When you read the advice: "Hitch your wagon to a star," you'll never think it means to tie up to some idol of the movies and keep blowing in your two bits. I shall like to think of you, Gus, as back-tracking and side-tracking over our big and cousin-settled country—taking with you a ready smile and a ready heart; a ready hand to help and a spirit that while it judges does not condemn. Having these things you will have the true comradeship with your kind which is what we need most of all for any coming Democracy of Humanity. You will be a citizen of the poet's "City of Friends." You will know that the Golden Rule is meant to be more than a framed motto on the wall of a Sunday school only open once a week. No bushel of violet talc will ever hide your light, Gus. I have faith that you're going to keep on shining.



Massies Mill, Virginia.

Dear Uncle Lisha and Cousins:

I wonder if you all will listen to me for a few minutes and help me solve a problem. The problem is I want to bob my hair and I want you all to help me decide whether or not to do it. I want each of you to write and tell me what to do, and the majority will win. So many of the girls here where I live have bobbed hair.

I am five feet, four inches tall, with blue eyes, medium brown hair, and I weigh 116 pounds.

The Shearing of Henry Garland

By Hapsburg Liebe

Copyright, 1928, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

TO sit with "'Gatorhide" Sanderson beside a night campfire in the never-never land of the Everglades, that back o' beyond of sawgrass and moccasins, is something to remember in after years. He is a tall, lean, iron-hard man of forty-odd, and tanned past the hue of weathered copper. Once he was a person of some means, and he went to the 'Glades for a hunt and wouldn't go back home, they say. He was a perfect guide, and always he kept us awake until midnight telling us stories in the quaint fashion he had.

The youngest member of our party had just asked if we were in any danger from Seminoles, and Sanderson had chuckled. He had his opportunity——

'Minds me o' the time when old Henry Garland used to come down here. Garland lived in Nashville, and he was at the head of a big lumber company, trust, corp'ration, or something, and he liked the woods better'n anybody else I ever saw except me. Every year it got harder and harder for his daughter, all he had on earth in the shape o' kin, to get him started for home, which mebbe is why he don't never come down any more. He'd talk Big Lake Walk-in-the-Water and shear little lumber lambs for ten months, and fish and hunt around Big Lake Walk-in-the-Water the other two o' the twelve. He had a pine-log bungalow of a thing built on the shore o' the lake, and they called it Garland Lodge. You could get to it in a boat by a 'round-about way, or you could drive to it in a wagon but not in a automob'le.

His daughter was twenty-two, and he used to say she was "the most rowmantic girl in the world," and I guess he was right. Her name was Sadie, and she was as pretty as feemales ever gets to be, with her brown hair and eyes and her milk-fair skin. She had a figger that showed up fine in any kind o' dress, too.

Well, one o' the lumber lambs old Henry sheared one summer was a young feller name o' Finley, a strapping big, upstanding, fine-looking boy, and Miss Sadie's sweetheart. But Garland hisself was bitter set against this love affair. Maybe that's why he sheared Carter Finley so all-fired close. He had already picked out a fortune in coal for his girl to marry, and with it went a heavy, round, bald, red-faced feller name o' Kendrick—the "Jellyfish," Miss Sadie called him, sort o' when he wasn't looking.

Liking the woods as he did, it su'prised me to know old Henry was as narrer as that!

The Garland crowd—by which I mean old Henry and his daughter, Miss Sadie's spinster aunt and the Jellyfish—got down in December o' the year o' Carter Finley's shearin'. I'd had a letter from Garland, and I had the Lodge ready with a cook and plenty o' things to eat and everything else necessary.

The funny part of it was that young Finley had beat 'em down to the Big Lake Walk-in-the-Water country by a good two weeks, and he'd took up quarters in a dinky old cabin about the size of a beartrap, which stood across the north end of the lake from Garland Lodge. On the morning after the coming o' the Garlands, he slipped over in his canoe, which he poled like a Indian as often as he paddled like a white man, and brought a fresh quarter o' venison and a young gobbler. Old Henry hisself stood on the porch o' the Lodge when Finley walked up with his gifts like some brother to that big, noted hunter they called Nimrod.

"Greetings!" says he, laughing boyish-like. "I see you've arrived."

"Good evidence you're not blind," Garland growls. It don't never do a man any good to have somebody he's just robbed, even in the modern fashion, bringing him presents.

"What're you doing down here, Finley?" demands old Henry.

Finley put his big hunk o' deermeat and the bird down on the steps, straightened up, folded his arms, and grinned.

"I heard you talking about this country so much that I simply had to see it, you know," he says. "And then," he goes on, the look in his eyes seeming suddenly a little odd, "this time o' year is not a good time o' year to make a new try at the lumber business."

I reckon Miss Sadie must ha' heard and recognized his voice, for she piled right out and shook hands with him, and behind her Aunt Emily stalked and the Jellyfish waddled. These last-named two sure didn't seem especially well pleased at the presence o' Finley, his gifts notwithstanding.

"I thought you'd all be hungry for game," says Finley, "and so I brought you some. Killed it yesterday, and you'd better look to it, or it might not keep. I'm living just across the end o' the lake," he says, "and I'll be glad to see you when you come over. The bass are striking at yellow surface plugs now," says he, "though the mudfish are pretty bad for yellow. I advise your party, Mr. Garland, to stick together most o' the time; and I would see, if I were you, that the two women were not left alone for long. Good-by!"

He went back to his canoe, stepped into it, and was off like a brown streak. Sadie's father muttered something under his breath and turned to me. I was cleaning my old 30-30.

"Look here, 'Gatorhide," he says—he always called me that—"Look here, 'Gatorhide, what did he mean by advising us to stick together, and so on, for most o' the time? There's no danger except from snakes, is there?

I shook my head. "Mebbe," I answers, "he means Seminoles."

"Seminoles!" explodes Garland. "Bah! Did oyt that so-called chief we had with us at dinner last January weep and cry to go home no his mother? Bah, 'Gatorhide; you're dreaming!"

"Mebbe he did," says I. "But the Indian was in a white man's house, Mr. Garland, where everything was strange to him. They're not big kids like that on their own stamping-ground. You ought to witness one o' their green-corn dances. I guess it would rather flute your hair!"

Not that I was afraid of the few Seminoles in that vicinity. But I was sure old Henry would get a lot more enjoyment out o' his two months in the 'Glades section if he thought there was some danger hovering near us. He was built like that, you see.

"Braver men than you," I added, "has turned white at a green-corn dance."

Just then I caught a glance from Miss Sadie and I certainly didn't know how to take it at the time. It seemed, though, more like a glance o' thankfulness than anything else. I figgered that she was a little mad at her dad over the Jellyfish business, and it turned out later that I was dead right.

Well, a week passed before we even saw any Indians, and I noticed that old Henry took a firmer grip on his two-eyed buck-gun when we ran across them, which caused me to remember Finley's warning. Garland had brought down a deer and several turkeys and fox-squirrels, but Jellyfish Kendrick hadn't killed anything but time and one of those little blue fly-up-the-creek birds; always he was looking for snakes, and not game! Once I had to pull him out o' a bog-hole with a wild vine, and he was so muddy that even Miss Sadie's Aunt Emily laughed at him when he got back to the Lodge. Snakes, nothing! A snake wouldn't ha' wasted good pizen on him. I got afraid a rabbit would bite him!

At the end of this first week, old Henry caught his daughter taking a canoe-ride in the cool o' the evening with Carter Finley, and he busted up their little heaven immediate. He called her in, and advised her not to see Finley any more if she regarded peace at Garland Lodge as being something worth while. Miss Sadie turned aside without saying anything, got my eye with hers, and actually winked at me—me, 'Gatorhide Sanderson!

Then it happened.

The three of us menfolks had come in an hour by sun, and found Aunt Emily tight asleep and Miss Sadie gone. Old Henry turned pale, went to the porch, and yelled her name until you could have heard him a mile away at least, and had never any answer. Aunt Emily woke up and rushed out to the porch.

"What's the matter, Henry?" she cries. "What's the matter, that you're yelling like a wild man that way?"

"Sa—dee!" Garland continues to shout, without paying any attention to his sister. "Oh, Sa—a—dee!"

Aunt Emily went back into the house. Two minutes later, she was showing us a handful o' long, red feathers.

"Indians!" she chatters. "Henry, they've kidnapped her!"

Garland looked at the feathers. Their color wasn't natural; they'd been painted.

"Impossible!" says he. "Kidnapping girls would flt in fifty years ago, but not now. Impossible!"

Aunt Emily could shrug her shoulders like a man. She shrugged her shoulders in that fashion now.

"'Gatorhide," says Garland, turning to me, "do you think they'll harm her?"

"Mebbe not," I tells him. I had not really reached any conclusion as yet. "Mebbe," I tells him, "they're only holding her for ransom. Hadn't we better look for footprints around the house. We might be able to strike their trail, you know."

All around the Lodge we looked, but we found no footprints that meant anything. Then Aunt Emily ran across a fringed buckskin shoe lying among the cypress knees and saw-palmettos at the edge o' the lake, and this she brought to old Henry. Garland went plumb white at sight of it.

"Shows they were in a hurry," says he. "Well, they'd better be! I'll make sieves out o' their hides, dog-gone 'em! We've got to get busy now—I'll call Carter Finley——"

He started for the lake shore, and met Finley himself. Finley had just stepped from his canoe.

"Anything wrong, Mr. Garland?" he asks sort o' anxiouslike. "I heard you calling——"

"Anything wrong!" breaks in old Henry. "I should say there is something wrong! Would I be bellowing around here like a bull alligator if there was nothing wrong? Sadie has entirely disappeared, and there are signs that say she's been carried off by Seminoles—that's all! We want you to help us, Finley; eh?"

"Mebbe you'd better get Kendrick to help you," says Finley, carelesslike. He jerks his thumb toward the Jellyfish, who hadn't said a single word since our discov'ry o' the girl's absence. "You always preferred Kendrick to me, you know, in everything, and it's only natural for you to prefer him to me now. If it was me that was going to marry her, I would have her back here safely in five hours, Mr. Garland. Yes, better get Kendrick."

My, but he rubbed it in! I thought old Henry would blow up immediate, but he didn't. When he spoke again, his voice was right tame.

"Look here, Finley. Listen to me. It's not a case of who she's going to marry, but a case of—of humanity. I'm asking you, in the name of humanity, to help us. Will you?"

Finley smiles a little. "Oh, well, if you choose to put it in that way," says he, "I guess I'll have to. That is," he says, "if you'll let me have charge o' the search, and I suppose you will. I've been learning the country fast, Mr. Garland."

Garland frowned, but he finally agreed.

"All right," nods Finley. "All right. I will cross the lake and make for Moccasin Slough by way of Cypress Run. You and Kendrick will go by land to Moccasin by way of Hell's Hole bayhead. Wait if you get there first—but I guess you When we meet, we'll decide what to do. are nearly always some Indians around casin Slough, you know. A little gr some matches, Miss Garland, please. We——"

"But what about 'Gatorhide?" asks Henry.

"Oh," says Finley, "we'll leave walk guard duty around the lodge at protect Miss Garland."

Old Henry began to object. "But hide knows the country better than us——"

"See here," Finley cuts in. "Didn agree to let me have charge o' the matter"

Shortly afterward, the young man across the lake in his canoe, and Garland ted for the jungle with Kendrick at and looking always for snakes. Kendr heard that a rattler will bite the secon on the trail more often than the first. true.

At noon o' the next day, the three came back, and they came back with Sadie. The Jellyfish was the most c human being I've ever clapped eyes mud from top to toe. As we reached the Lodge porch, face took on a queer look, and he Carter Finley.

"Carter," says he, "I have see own eyes the difference in the timb Er—once upon a time you asked portant question, and I told you couldn't have her. If you'll find her if she still wants you, by George, sir yours, dog-gone you. But for hea hurry and find her, if you're going to Finley pulled off a advanced editio Emily's shrug.

"Really, I'm sorry for you, Mr. he says, sadlike. "You're very I think. Surely, you don't know saying, Mr. Garland."

"I don't; eh?" flares old Henry eh?" He takes hold o' Finley's sleeve. "You find her, and see keep my word, whatever else I do that I should!"

"Man, what are you thinking Finley. "Why, Sadie will get fortune, and I'm as poor as a fly-up Finley turns off. "I believe you she'll be back safe by sundown over his shoulder. "A man can harder when he's personally int know."

In another minute, he was gone.

"You're going to have to mudd all up, Sadie," says Carter, "or th fall flat."

At that, Miss Sadie, "the mo girl in the world," jumped into a hole up to her knees, and Finley h her out.

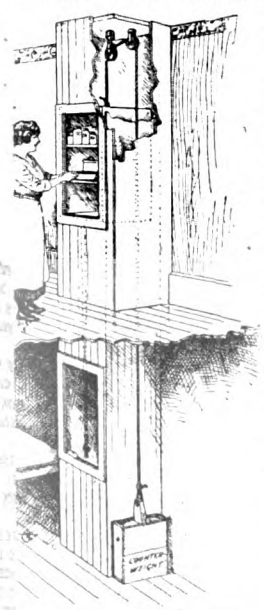
ouse Cleaning, Renovating, and Improved Conveniences

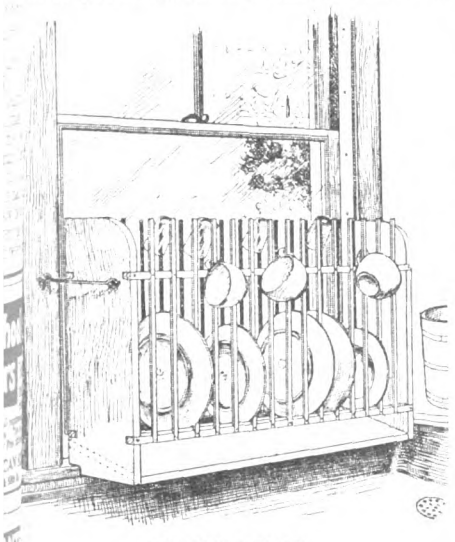


By Estelle Garland

opyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ETTING a maximum of healthful cleanliness with a minimum of labor becomes an increasingly important problem as the housewife faces the scarcity of labor and the high cost of materials. To intelligently pursue the daily rounds of housework one must sharply question the how and why of each act instead of ly following traditional methods. We no r scrub unfinished floors or black stoves. drudgery of taking up, beating and putting carpets has disappeared since they have ically given way to the use of rugs, and their ng has revolutionized housecleaning and al- housekeeping.

ee March heralds the approach of housee- ing days, the general repair and replace- s after long winter use, and the handling and ction of woolens and furs against moth dam- let us see if we cannot introduce some methods and devices that will operate as preventives. A general twice-a-year house eval is usually unnecessary under right man- ent. If the work is carefully planned, if the of furnishings that are easy to keep clean hosen and handled in the right way, and if sion is made for keeping all the dirt possible of the house, there will be no need for an urning that results in discomfort to the en- household. Moreover, this systematic house- ing saves labor in the end and is economical e materials used in the furnishings and care e house. Almost every housekeeper has a more or less fixed routine of work, which might be called her plan. Oftentimes, with this plan as a basis, the housecleaning can be so organized that the housekeeper can save herself much time and many steps. These are the days when it is wiser economy than ever to make "the head save the heels."



ITCHEN TO CELLAR LIFT.

To keep clean rather than to make clean is a thoroughly practical working principle. This means daily tidying of rooms in constant use, distributing the cleaning, especially the heavy kinds, through the week, and removing dirt not only frequently but thoroughly by methods that have been proved good according to both scientific and practical lards. All the members of the household help if only by keeping their own possessions rder and putting things that they use in in good condition.

hat kind of furnishings the house has and the house itself is arranged and finished have h more effect on the work of housecleaning many persons realize. In many cases just a changes will soon pay for themselves in time energy saved. For instance, durable water- f finish or a covering such as linoleum, for floor in the kitchen and pantry, and smoothly hed floors in the rest of the house, will prove iselves an economy. Doing away with super- is shelves and mouldings, filling up cracks and ices in which dirt lodges, and arranging ade- e storage places will also help.

eeping dirt out of the house, or "preventive" eecleaning as it might be called, is well worth effort. Removing the dirt regularly from win- sills, porches, steps and walks helps in this, lo also screens covered with cheese-cloth or r material through which air will pass, but dust and soot. Such screens are particularly ul in pantries and storerooms, for doors and adows near the ground against which dirt of sorts is blown.

Much dirt can be kept out by doing away with rth walks and bare ground near the house, by listing that mats and stationary scrapers be ed outside the doors, and by providing special ces just inside where muddy rubbers and boots d coats may be left.

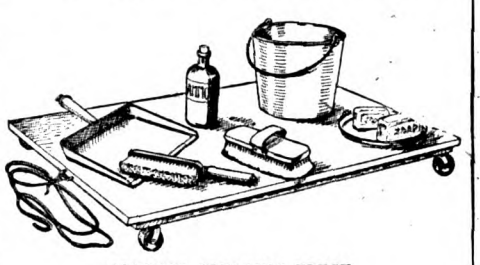
Implements and Materials for Care of House

No matter how carefully the housecleaning is ganized, it cannot be done easily and quickly thout suitable cleaning tools and materials. e ideal arrangement is to have a complete set ored in orderly fashion in a convenient closet, t if this is impossible, put up two strong elves for bottles, soaps and other things that nnot be hung, and on the under side of lower elf put in a good many large cup hooks from hich to hang brooms, carpet sweeper, various ushes, etc. A coarse curtain can be hung from e edge of the top shelf making an arrangement not unsightly. Following is a list of tools well worth their cost in making work easier:

Corn broom for carpets and rough surfaces, such as concrete, brick and stone.

Hair brush-broom for smooth floors and floor coverings, such as wood, linoleum and oilcloth.

Wall brush of lamb's wool, or loops of soft cotton twine, or soft bristles. A bag of cotton flannel slipped over a broom may take the place of a wall brush.



Whisk broom for various purposes.

Long-handled mop, long-handled scrub brush, and hand scrub brush.

Paint brushes for reed furniture and upholstery.

Drainpipe brush made of stiff bristles and flexible wire.

Dry mop either untreated or oiled. The latter holds the dust better and renews the finish on painted, varnished or shellacked floors, but must not be used on waxed floors.

A mop wringer for floors that are washed with water. It is fastened to the pail and saves the worker much stooping, keeps the hands from the water and removes more water from the cloth than would be possible by hand wringing.

Carpet sweepers are effective for taking up surface dirt. A hand-power combination carpet sweeper vacuum cleaner takes up surface dirt and to some extent sucks up fine particles.

Carpet or rug beaters may be of heavy wire or of either flat or round reed. Those of flat reed are least hard on the carpet fibers.

Dusters should be soft and should shed neither lint nor ravelings. A duster is best moistened by passing it through steam; by wetting one corner of the cloth, rolling it up, and letting it stand for a short time; or by wringing together one dry cloth and one that has been wrung out of water as dry as possible. A dust cloth may be oiled by applying a few drops of kerosene or light lubricating oil on one corner, rolling the cloth and letting it stand until the oil has spread evenly. Never use feather dusters as they scatter but do not remove dust. When furniture polish is used for the simple purpose of cleaning and polishing, shake the polish well, then sprinkle one-half of a good-sized cheese-cloth duster with the polish, fold over the dry half, roll tightly and place in a tin coffee can over night. This will do a large amount of dusting.

Useful Cleaning Agencies

Water the most necessary and common cleaning material, should be used lukewarm and not be allowed to stand on floors or woodwork, nor to get into cracks or seams.

A soap solution should be kept on hand for cleaning as it does the work quicker, more evenly and safely than using soap from the bar. One pound of soap and three quarts of water are heated slowly together until the soap is dissolved, and then the solution is poured into wide-mouthed bottles from which it is used.

Ammonia, borax and sal-soda (washing soda) are alkalis used both to soften hard water and to loosen dirt. If concentrated ammonia can be bought and diluted at home by using about one part ammonia to seven parts water, it is usually more economical and satisfactory for general cleaning than the dilute form sold as household ammonia. Borax is least likely to injure delicate fabrics, but is the most expensive. Washing soda is bought in coarse powder form and should be thoroughly dissolved in water before using.

DRAWER WITH TRAY FOR SILVER.

Oxalic acid is used to bleach stains on wood and to clean copper and brass. A safe way to use it is to put one ounce of the crystals in a half-pint bottle of water. This amount of water will not dissolve all the crystals, so more water may be added as the saturated solution is used, and more crystals added to the bottle as they disappear. Oxalic acid is a poison, and to avoid accidental poisoning, tie a tiny bell around the neck of the bottle.

Gasolene and benzine are used to dissolve grease and sometimes control insects, but should always be used out of doors or in an out-building away from any kind of flame.

Kerosene will cut grease and loosen dirt.

Ammonia will remove white spots from varnished surfaces but should be used rapidly. Apply a few drops of the ammonia to a wet cloth, rub the spots, dry with a fresh cloth and polish with a good furniture polish or with oil.

Very soiled and sticky furniture requires more than a cleaning polish; it must be washed. Two quarts of boiling water, seven tablespoons of good linseed oil and three tablespoons of spirits of turpentine is an excellent wash for furniture and all leather upholstery. As soon as the wash cools enough to bear the hands in it, stir vigorously and wring out a soft cloth, and swing in the air until lukewarm before applying to the furniture. Wipe with a fresh cloth and rub with furniture polish.

Dustless dusters should be kept on hand in a tightly covered tin box. They are easily made and a great comfort when dusting because they hold all the dust. It is not necessary to clean the dusters until they appear quite soiled. Shake or hang on the line after using and you will be surprised to observe that they are quite free from loose dust. To make, use squares of cheese-cloth dampened in the following preparation: One dessertspoon of oil of paraffin, and five cents' worth of oil of lavender thoroughly mixed with one pint of kerosene oil. Sprinkle the dusters (this will make ten one-yard square) then roll and let stand until the oils are evenly absorbed. If they seem at all wet, hang for a short time in the sunshine until the moisture is reduced.

Furniture polish for rubbing up various kinds of finished woodwork is made by mixing one part raw linseed oil with two parts turpentine and adding a little melted beeswax. A second lighter polish is made by mixing one part light mineral oil with two parts kerosene.

Floors

A well-laid floor of seasoned soft wood can be given the appearance of hard wood, and a surface that wears well. First, sandpaper off any soiled places. Heat boiled linseed oil to the boiling point, carry out of doors and add an equal amount of spirits of turpentine. Apply at once with a large brush so the oil can all be used while hot. Let dry for two days then give the floor a second coat, dry three days and apply the third coat. After this dries you will have the grain of the wood filled and a firm elastic surface that must be given two coats of good floor varnish, allowing the first to dry several days before the second is applied. The longer the varnish has to dry the less easily it will mar. This process requires considerable time, but it is well worth the effort. To clean, use a dry mop, and occasionally, lukewarm water to which a little kerosene has been added.

For a floor covering, nothing equals a good quality of linoleum, for it is durable, easily cared for and gives a room an attractive appearance. In buying linoleum one must carefully consider the pattern and the wear it will receive. Plain linoleums require more care as they show dust and marks. The mottled effects are the most satisfactory for hard wear, such as in the kitchen, pantry, back halls. Where there are children and the living-room receives hard wear, a small-figured linoleum makes a good-looking, sensible floor covering, which can be relieved with plain rugs.

An art square for the living-room is made of plain carpeting, sewed together in strips. It should be of a soft neutral shade. After sewing

The Lady of the Velvet Mask

By Augustin W. Breeden

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ALTHOUGH the masked ball at the big studio of Jean Jacques Fournier in the Impasse Royer Collard was hardly well started, Harry Fernald, Paris art student from Virginia, found himself bored to extinction, not by the artificiality and false glamour of the Bohemian mob gathered there that night, but simply because there were times when everything in this boasted Paris bored him so. He departed without making excuses or announcing his exit to any one; such a thing was not necessary at these free-and-easy soirees. It was snowing heavily outside; the snow blanketed the wintry air and took away its sharpness.

"Ah, the snow is at least real. Thank God for something to hide all this grime and dirt and paint and glitter."

A girl muffled to the lips in furs and wearing a dark-colored mask passed him walking rapidly. She was bareheaded and wore a bright red rose in her brown hair. She paused before a blank wall where the light from the Boule Miche fell brilliantly and, taking some colored crayons from a bag she carried, began swiftly and artistically to make a sketch upon the wall. Fernald killed time, loitered in a doorway and pretended merely to be watching the crowd in the boulevard go by. Then as the girl thrust her crayons back into the bag he stepped across the street and glanced at the picture. It was a red rose with bright green leaves, and beneath it was an arrow pointing down the boulevard in the direction of the observatory. Glancing up quickly he saw the girl hurrying in that direction.

"Some model or clever amateur, bored like myself with Jean Jacques's show and leaving a plain trail by which her lover is to follow. Ah, suppose I——" The thought became action; Fernald turned swiftly into the Boulevard Saint Michel and followed at a distance that bobbing red rose in the crisscrossing mob. He lost her but kept on, now more slowly.

At the corner of the Rue Michelet he was rewarded. He once more came upon the young woman just finishing a second sketch.

"My, what wings she must have to her feet and what lightning in her fingers!" This time it was a flying bird with a golden arrow beneath it pointing toward the Rue d'Assas.

"She's certainly marking out a plain trail for her lover; but why not have handed him her address at once? Ah, but intrigue, that is the Parisian game. Well, a trail is something that one may follow as well as another; so I——"

In the Rue Bara he saw her once more at her sketching. The arrow now pointed toward the Cemetiere du Montparnasse. And in the boulevard of that name, where it cornered with the Rue Delamere, he came up with her again and joined the crowd that in this less busy thoroughfare was watching with admiration while she drew a bouquet of violets.

"I will speak to her—no, perhaps I had better not—I will—no, I will not, not yet."

As the girl sped away she flung back a bright glance through the eye-slits of her mask, for his benefit Fernald thought; and at the end of the Rue de la Gaite she once more glanced about, then detached the rose from her hair and dropped it on the snow by the side of the muddy walk. Fernald made a dash for the flower; but when he rose from stooping for it she was nowhere to be seen.

The Virginian went to the corner of every street that led into this short "Gayety Street" but found no more signboards. He turned into one cafe after another and looked the crowds over. She was not to be found. Finally he entered the Impasse de la Gaite and sat down in a crowded cafe at a table near the door where he could look out into the faces of all comers and goers. But he saw nothing more of his masked lady that night.

The next day he told his experience to Jean Jacques, his confessor in all matters of the heart.

"And so," said Jean Jacques, with jolly wrinkles in a face made fat by much success, "she finally pointed you to the Montparnasse Graveyard and to the entrance of the Catacombs. Had her symbols been skulls and crossed shinbones her meaning could hardly have been clearer. Doubtless her mask was worn simply to hide a death's-head. Ah, let us interpret the legend: a rose for heart's-desire, a flying bird for hope, violets for constancy, and Death at the end of the short journey. Monsieur, she is a philosopher; she gave you a page from the book of existence."

"But, honestly, Monsieur Fournier, why do you suppose she was drawing all those sketches, and why did she drop the rose?"

"Oh, you infant, have you not learned that ladies of high and low degree equally love to play the little game of hare-and-hounds? Go back tonight to Gayety Street and the grim neighborhood of the Catacombs, and——good luck!"

The next day the sun shone and all Paris took to the streets, and that day, having drunk in the glories of the limpid sky, and the flashing Seine until he was intoxicated with those heady wines, Fernald again sought the neighborhood where he had lost the lady of his dreams and found several more of those delicate signs, always pointing, as he learned by cross-coursing them, toward the Impasse de la Gaite.

He ate an early dinner in the neighborhood, keeping his eye always on the passing crowd. She passed. He overpaid his bill, rushed into the street and after her. At a corner she once more dropped a rose and hurried away. This time he took no chance of letting her escape him by any such trick, but left the rose on the ground and raced away after her.

He caught up with her. "Where—where can I meet you?"

"In the Cafe d'Alsace, Impasse de la Gaite, at nine o'clock—au plaisir, monsieur," and she was gone.

Long before nine he was at the meeting place waiting for his lady of the mask. He had bought a bouquet of hothouse carnations and was prepared to order the best wines and the best viands the house afforded. But nine o'clock came, then half-past nine, and still no masked lady.

While Fernald waited he was attracted by the music of a blind violinist, whom he had noticed on his previous visit to the cafe. The man played wonderfully; his playing was notable even in a city full of gifted musicians. There was a lilt about his music that seemed to lift one to the clouds.

He sipped very slowly at his wine; his natural impatience was passing over to annoyance and anger. A waitress in the threadbare black of the working woman and with a face that made him think of Jean Jacques's moralist of the Catacombs, came and murmured politely that he was perhaps waiting to keep a rendezvous. He confided in the hideous one. Had she seen this lady that so often wore a velvet mask in the street? She had not, not that night, but then, "ou la, la, les dames Parisiennes are notably fickle," and his dream in the velvet mask was probably at this very moment keeping a subsequent rendezvous with some other gentleman.

The lilting music became a dirge. The unspeakable boredom of Paris was returning upon the Virginian. He gulped down the last of his wine and hurried out into the crisp night air.

It was nearly a week before he again visited the Cafe d'Alsace. What sent him there finally was a chance remark let fall by Chrisney, a fellow student at the atelier where he worked.

"I saw your masked lady today over by the Pont Neuf. She was sketching a Cupid. I eased up and tried to get a peep under her mask, but I failed signally. She has eyes, boy, eyes! and a pair of lips that look kissable to me. Her drawing is excellent. I wonder if she is some grande dame from the Right Bank gallivanting over here for sport?"

That night Fernald sat in the Cafe d'Alsace listening once more to the strains of the blind violinist, and this time thought it hopeful music. And, sure enough, his Lady of the Velvet Mask suddenly materialized from nowhere and sank down into a seat at his table.

"You must pardon me, monsieur, for not coming the night I promised. I was—unavoidably occupied. I have been here every night since; you see I have done my best to keep the spirit of my promise."

"I am the delinquent," said Fernald in his most gallant fashion. "Ah, I should have returned the next night and every night thereafter. But now we can make up for lost time. By the way, I have not introduced myself—he laid his card upon the table—"and you are called?"

"Call me the Lady of the Mask," answered the girl in a silvery tone. "What is there to a name anyway except as one earns it for one's self? Illogical, they are usually mere family heirlooms handed down like bits of useless and meaningless bric-a-brac."

"But surely some shorter name——"

"Then call me Rose or Violet."

"I will call you La Rose or Ma Rose," said Fernald. "Ma Rose, what will you have for dinner? I trust they will not spoil your appetite by sending that scarecrow to wait on us."

"They will not," laughed La Rose. "They know my taste in waitresses and will send her elsewhere. Listen to that violin. Doesn't it seem to lift you out of yourself? To carry you away?"

"It is marvelous," answered Fernald. He managed to catch the lady's soft hand in his and held it for a moment beneath the corner of the table-cover.

Fernald drank during the dinner more wine than was good for his youthful head. He studied his lady's hands, the sort of hands an artist delights to draw; he studied her neck and shoulders, her hair, a crown of chestnut glory; and the music climbed and climbed, taking him up with it, till he conceived himself sitting on Olympus listening to the music of the gods. The eyes of his lady intrigued him like the eyes of some beautiful veiled lady of Arabia. To caress those lips! To kiss those baby eyelids through the slits in the soft velvet mask! He angled for the hand; missed it; angled for it again; caught it; but it escaped.

Meanwhile the girl occupied herself making little sketches of any interesting or grotesque habitue of the place of whom she could command a view, and kept up a running fire of talk which Fernald thought exceedingly clever. She did indeed make many shrewd philosophical observations like her remark about the value of names.

Finally when she saw he was drinking too much for his own good she hurried him from the place and out into the night air. At the corner of the Avenue due Maine she put out her little gloved hand: "Au plaisir, monsieur."

"But why must we part now? Why can't you go with me—au theater? au promenade?"

"Not tonight, monsieur; some other time perhaps."

"But when can I see you again?"

"Tomorrow night at the same hour and place."

That night, more intoxicated with the stars and with his adventure than with wine, Harry Fernald, born of a race of Virginia cavaliers, constructed a romance: The Lady of the Velvet Mask was a poor struggling artist unable to make a living by her art, as he would be for perhaps many years to come; and she drew these pictures to entice men—how he hated that word—to entice people to follow her to this cafe in Gayety Street so that she might thereby get each day a dinner to keep body and soul together. Had she not said she had waited for him every night at the Cafe d'Alsace? Poor girl! She had doubtless been fasting, and all because of his indifference.

But why the mask? Simple. It was pride. Did not he, too, wear a mask at times? Did not everyone he knew wear a mask because of pride, or shame, or sensitiveness? Why, he, if he had to beg, even in Paris, that wilderness of strangers, would certainly do so only in disguise. Poor girl! He would lift her out of this poverty, and then if she proved "serious"—he would make her his wife. He fell to sleep with a smile on his lips, picturing La Rose against the social background of his father's Virginia home.

It was following a second dinner with La Rose and a second refusal by her to promenade the city with him, that he bethought himself to visit his father's old friend, Dr. Petit, who lived in the Avenue Victor Hugo, where he had enjoyed a fashionable Parisian practice for the past ten years. This man was bound to know Parisian ways and Parisian ladies. Fernald's thought was that here was the man to go to for real advice. But at the sight of Dr. Petit's benign face and silver gray hair, the young man decided to make his call merely a formal one. Why, this man had known his mother! How could he talk to him of a Parisian intrigue?

From this time forth Harry Fernald neglected his studies. He went every night to the Cafe d'Alsace. He came to be a familiar figure in Gayety Street and was called there l'Americain. Be it known to the thrill hounding reader at this point that Gayety Street, in spite of its name, is not a street of evil repute, but simply a street where the poorer Parisians of that quarter of the city gather nightly to take their childlike amusement—a play street of the poor.

Sometimes Fernald found La Rose waiting for him at the cafe or materializing from nowhere beside his chair, and then the world was all rose-colored; but as often as not she disappointed him, and then his skies were gray and the music of the blind fiddler lugubrious, funereal. And every night on his pillow he made or developed a different romance about her, cued to some light hint, some word, some fleeting allusion. Harry Fernald was—no, he would not have admitted that he was in love—but he was balanced on a knife edge.

Then one night, as she permitted him for a brief moment to toy with her hand, he slipped a hundred-franc note into the opening of her glove. She tucked the folded bill farther into the glove and barely murmured a thank you. Here was an omen.

"Little one," he said huskily, "tell me who and what you are. You are in some sort of trouble—I have heard you sigh in the midst of laughter. If there is anything in the world I can do for you, please command me. Little one, I——I——"

"Listen to that violin," said the girl. "Doesn't it seem to you to be pleading?"

"Why are you so fond of music, especially of violin music? Yes, it is pleading, pleading with you to throw off the mask of mystery, pleading with me to—— Little one, I honestly want to help you. Tell me what I can do."

"Could you lend me two thousand francs?"

The practical turn she gave his offer came upon Fernald like a cold douche in the midst of a perfumed bath. He was taken aback. "After all, she is merely a skillful adventuress," he thought, "just as I might have guessed from her actions that first night." But he saw intoxicating possibilities. "I will bargain and higgle the market," he told himself; "what favors may I not win for two thousand francs?"

"Yes," he answered at length, "I will lend you two thousand francs; but with two conditions; first, that you will come with me two or three nights a week to the theaters and cafes of the Right Bank—I am lonely; I need a friend, a guide, to go about with me of nights——"

"I will do that—but for how long?"

"Ah, little bargainer, must I fix the time? For one month; and you need never pay back the loan. But that is only one of the two conditions; the other is——"

"The other?"

"That you will give up drawing these sidewalk pictures and come to my studio and pose for me two days each week."

The girl's neck and shoulders slowly crimsoned while her eyes regarded him earnestly. Finally she said in a faint tone:

"Very well. When can you hand me the two thousand francs?"

"Come to my apartments, Numero 31, Impasse, au Troisieme Etage, tomorrow at three o'clock—— But tonight—shall we not celebrate the bargain tonight? Remember, the last you will ever have to worry about matters. Shall we not celebrate?"

"Impossible, my friend. If it were possible, believe me, I would not say so. Listen to that violin—ah, it is speaking, speaking, speaking. Au plaisir, tomorrow then at three o'clock. Au plaisir, monsieur." He touched his hand lightly and was gone, disappearing by the back way through the cafe.

That night Fernald wandered for hours through the streets and boulevards, and showed himself a noctambulist. A prospect was before him that made him trembled with anticipation. If his romance were not all dead, an intrigue had been born to take its place. "Tomorrow! Tomorrow! Tomorrow!" was the recurrent burden of his thought. He reconsidered the whole case anew; he questioned his conscience. Finally he resigned himself to the will of the woman; whatever her motive she plainly showed that she deserved, that she should have from him. Why, the solution was in her hands. Having reached this decision at once he saw it; her fate was entirely in her hands. Having reached this decision of his mind he was letting himself into his home in the Impasse Royer Collard, he lay down and slept the sleep of an innocent child.

The next day, his day, dawned beneath a leaden gray sky, and by ten o'clock the snow was falling heavily, and it continued to fall heavily all day. Fernald did not attend art classes that day, as he very seldom did now. Instead he went out and secured three big sacks of billets of wood for his fire, bought a new rug to lay before it, brushed and dusted the room so that the concierge hardly recognized the place. Then after one o'clock he went out into the storm to the best restaurant in the quarter and ordered two sumptuous dinners sent up at three o'clock, went to his bank across the river and drew out notes of five hundred francs each.

Would she come? His one fear was that she would not come and accept his two thousand francs. At that moment he wished in his heart she had asked for five thousand.

But at three o'clock on the stroke of the hour a taxi drew up before his house. He was there to pay the driver when he met the lady of his dreams tripping lightly up the stairs. Her hood and furs were dappled with great flakes of snow, and her red lips looked never so red as at that moment. He believed he understood now once for all why the lovely girl wore the violet-colored mask. From the top of her head to her little slippered feet not a more intriguing figure could be imagined. "Why, if some dressmaker sees her, masks will be all the go in Paris before the winter is half out. It is like the mohammedan women; they are really the most females with any sense."

La Rose was in a bright and happy mood. She rallied him brightly for the mood of silence that he seemed to fall into from time to time. She stirred the fire, gave the room deft touches here and there, and set out the dinner herself meanwhile like a happy child. She was adorable.

After dinner, which ended for Fernald in extreme physical languor, he smoked, and refused the cigarettes he proffered her as she always done before. "The devil," he thought, "nothing is changed; she is simply eating instead of at the cafe. She's making a mock of me."

About five La Rose glanced at the clock. "I must go," she said in a tone in which there was no trace of languor.

Fernald took from his pocketbook the five banknotes and held them out to her. "Remember," he said, "I am not lending you these. I am simply employing you for a month as model and——sort of companion. Take them; it is an honorable transaction."

The girl paled and hesitated. "I will take it," she said, "if you will make me two promises: that you will not ask me to renew my visit to this room or to—to pose the ensemble."

"As for the second, I promise [illegible] want you only for costume poses. But, [illegible] why should you not take off your mask [illegible] street, in the cafes, I can understand, but in the room alone with me—you are unreasonable."

"What if I should tell you that I am a lady, not unknown to many by—portraits old and ugly, and that I choose this method of amusing myself in the oncoming winter days."

"Winter of your days, the devil! Your movement speaks of April, not of November; you are not ugly; your eyes and lips, your hair and shoulders give that word the lie! La Rose, I love you! Before the month is [illegible] swear to win you and to persuade you to [illegible] your mask!"

"What days shall I come to pose for you, and at what hour?"

Fernald had given the matter no thought, but one wish was to have her back in his room at the earliest possible hour. "Come tomorrow at eleven o'clock," he said. "Let's see, tomorrow is Wednesday. Come Wednesdays and Fridays. If the days we can of course spend the day together on the boulevards."

"Alors, tomorrow at eleven. At least, my friend. You are a good boy; you have [illegible] me——" she suddenly stooped and kissed his hand, and then before he could recover his senses she was gone.

For two weeks she came regularly to pose for him. He ransacked the Latin quarter and more drew his allowance to secure costumes worthy of her. She posed as a Spanish masker, as a [illegible] tante at a masked ball, as the favorite of the Arabian harem. Fernald painted feverishly at it or a wonder painted well. She reminded him continually to paint while the light was good, and often helped him with little technical difficulties. Possibly she was the more gifted of the two, as she played the role of grande dame to perfection, permitting him no familiarities.

But two nights of each week and always on Wednesdays he showed her off to his American friends of the Right Bank and became the envy again of callow youth and accomplished roue. She made a little sensation at Maxim's and on the Boulevard des Italiens. There were introductions. He gave him for the purpose the name Madame de la Debutry and the explanation that she was a great lady from the south taking a little winter pleasure at a great distance from home. "Ah, very proper that she should mask. What a pity that more ladies have not thought of that expedient." Others did think of it, and for a nine-days' divertisement masks appeared here and there among the smart set of the Right Bank, and threatened to become the rage, but the movement was not properly sponsored, since no one seemed to know who this Madame de la Debutry actually was, and so for lack of a sponsor it died.

One thing La Rose never permitted, that was that Fernald should take her home. She would have him accompany her for protection to the nearest subway station and then forbid him to enter the train with her.

Fernald had begun romancing again, and the legends he created about her would have filled a volume. Then——

One morning when she was almost due he began cursing himself for a nerveless and chicken fool. He told himself that he would—but then she had become the dearest thing in the world to him. The month was only half gone; why spoil everything? And yet, perhaps this was just what she was waiting for, violence, the wooing of a cave man. He told himself that he was an idiot who had never been able to understand a woman. And while he cogitated she tapped at the door.

"Now!" he said to himself.

As she stepped in he seized her hand and kissed it. "Ah, Ma Rose, at last! Little one, I am insane with love of you! Do not refuse me any longer! Tell me you are free to marry me!" He was still holding the back of her gloved hand to his lips, and suddenly he drew her by sheer physical force into his arms. His lips touched hers for an instant so fleeting that he could never remember afterward whether he had actually kissed her or not. Then slowly, with the force of her will more than of her muscles, she pushed away and [illegible]

TAKING COMFORT

House Furnishings

HE touch of domestic comfort as above pictured was but one of many visions our publisher had in mind when he named his magazine COMFORT, 35 years ago. Such a conception could not be developed in a day, nor in a year, but when Gannett symbolized his high aims and purby putting the great key through COMFORT ant all it implied, that his magazine should e a living medium which would unlock the to millions of homes and hearts, and light ay to a greater prosperity and to new ideals comfort of living.

ng a descendant of good old New England Mr. Gannett was born to the belief that nward reality of comfort found its source in the home, and this, combined with the er belief that all progress followed the paths ucation, Mr. Gannett spent many years of ng and ceaseless work in creating a housemagazine that would teach the resulting rts of frugality and industry, of time and s well spent.

rty-five years have wrought changes in wo work, due to scientific discoveries and facproductions, and the indications are that will follow. It seems but a surprisingly ears ago when most things consumed were ced within the household and the woman's ibution to the family was almost wholly cre- whereas now, she must meet the large probf wisely spending the family income that the may be obtained therefrom. But whatever vements and changes may come, the successousehold will always be the one where there a wise management of the working power family. There must be economy of strength ll as money, for nothing so reduces efficiency e dissipation of energy.

r exemplifying COMFORT'S original purpose, lumns have kept pace with the rapid develnts of the times which have continually ined the demand for a comfort producing magaoo many people are inclined to travel in the e monotonous groove with mind closed to sehold comforts, believing there is a certain e in using the old things in the good old way. n there are others who cherish the mistaken that comfort spells extravagance, and they, go along without investigating. As a matter act, we all need occasionally to get outside of selves to obtain a fresh viewpoint, and this aps particularly to allowing ourselves to become fixed in our habits of routine. In fairness to self every housewife must occasionally ask herif results achieved give balance to the exditure of time and energy.

Comforts in Furnishings and Arrangements

hen this reaches you, my dear friends, springe will be here, that wondrous season when hua beings, like the buds on the trees, are strugg to snake off their winter restraints and unl into a new life of sunshine and freedom. ince less medicine, living in the open air durwarm weather as an insurance against illness winter, household furniture that can be kept itary, the banishment of carpets, and simplypared foods have become a matter of educan, the housewife of today finds herself in a era of civilization that is taking drudgery out housework. Styles and fads are bound to be h us always, but the parlor opened only for ddings and funerals, the musty-smelling guest mber, and brandy for infants will never come k.

As a whole, the modern methods of household rangement and devices go a long way toward ping the housewife fit for her many-sided votion of home-maker, cook, laundress and seamess, and the woman who "checks up" on herf knows the key to her success is keeping menlly refreshed. "Nerves," uncontrolled, constite a mother's greatest enemy, for her unhappy ate of mind will be reflected in the conduct of r children. In the days of the closed parlor, omen did not enter into out-of-door recreations any extent, and social restrictions put an agenit on the young matron's activities, but today ere is no more joyful sight than to see mother d children enjoying the same sports together. other goes camping, fishing, boating, motoring, does whatever the children most enjoy, and ith it all can dress as they do, in flannel shirt d knickerbockers. And in so doing she has the cial approval of the community in which she ves. Truly, times have changed!

Furnishings That Create a Home Atmosphere

On the cover of this, our Household Number, e have featured a general plan arrangement for kitchen porch to be used as a combination liv- and dining-room. Also there are four additional units illustrating practical furnishings and roupings that are restful and homelike.

If we could make a tour for the express purpose of seeing the different ways that living-in-the-open has been evolved to meet individual means and needs, we would find many surprises awaiting us. The lure of the open is very strong in the American, and as soon as a definite plan or desire has been attained, it is often amazing how ideas follow and comfort is worked out of that which was uncomfortable and inconvenient. It takes but a slight trick of the imagination to understand the benefits to be derived from a screened-in porch where, of an evening, reading, conversation and games may be enjoyed, and during the daytime meals can be served and much of their preparation accomplished. And if there is no special arrangement for sleeping out of door this porch can readily be converted into a sleeping-porch by setting up canvas or spring cots. Where the porch is for general use it should not be crowded as this would entail unnecessary rearranging.

At the first appearance of warm weather the housewife will put in order and store away all the things that catch the summer dust and are in no way necessary to the family needs. She will then rearrange and decide what is usable on the porch. The house may look a little forlorn at first but the relaxation and sense of freedom that follows is like starting on a vacation, and really that is what it is, a vacation from the many things we do not require when we have in their place the pure air and sunshine.

Before deciding just how the furniture will be arranged, let us first take a look at the porch itself to see what can be done here and there to add to its general comfort. Screens, of course, and common cotton fly netting will last an entire season. It is rapidly tacked in place from floor to ceiling and the use of too many fastenings is eliminated by holding the edge with long, narrow strips of wood with a brad here and there. If at one end the view is objectionable, lattice-work of light strips will conceal it, and it may be ornamental as well. Awnings, Japanese or sailcloth curtains add to the porch comforts. The most useful cloth curtains for a porch that has open spaces to the floor are made by fastening one end of the curtain to quite a heavy rod or pole which acts as a weight and prevents the wind from blowing it. The top edge is finished with a strip of wood run through a hem like an ordinary window shade. Cords and small pulleys are so arranged as to roll the curtain from top or bottom. Flower boxes will make your porch attractive, but if you look upon the green of the trees and fields it is enough. A dish of wild flowers for the table is refreshing.

Only such furniture as is necessary to the family use should appear on the porch. More will take away the sense of freedom. A long table of home construction such as we see at church suppers answers all purposes, and a crash runner gives it a cozy touch. The hanging hammock can be recommended for comfort, and for either adults or children it is generally useful. If the mattress-cushion is even it can be converted into a sleeping hammock at night. If a strip of cloth is securely fastened across the front it makes an excellent cage for baby who will then be away from drafts.

Canvas reclining chairs add an element of comfort if your porch is spacious. Wicker furniture, painted light green, is practical for indoors or outdoors. Folding tables are very useful, and the folding canvas stools for extra guests can be hung in some convenient place when not in use.

Strips of coco matting sewed together make suitable rugs if you need them. Avoid any furnishings that are likely to be upset by the wind, and all ornamentation unless it belongs to the great out of doors.

A piece of furniture which I might call indispensable to porch life is the kitchen wagon. Have one, even though it is no more than a stand on casters. Many times the whole night meal may be put on the wagon, pushed to the desired place, and the whole family group around and eat, picnic fashion. Then as a side-table it is extremely useful, and when not in use for holding food it can be utilized as a sewing table.

The object of this article is not to advance set ideas on home furnishings but to give some general outlines from which the housewife will find assistance in meeting her special needs. Writing to the home-maker is always a work of pleasure because we are all in quest of that which will save energy, save money and bring us the most enjoyment.

If we were to start at the foundation we should put fresh wall-paper on every room. If you can spend what it will cost to do this you will get large returns, for nothing is more restful, or so changes the general aspect of a house, and this the woman needs and deserves who spends the larger part of her time within.

In selecting papers, make a study of light, the general color effect of furniture and the purpose of each room. If your dealer carries only highly-colored, large-figured papers, ask to look at the sample book, and select papers that do not announce themselves as soon as you enter the room. Plain papers are always safe, and fill their mission by simply becoming the setting or background for pictures, bric-a-brac, mirrors, books, etc.

Browns, if they incline toward the golden tones, are restful, durable and pleasing for a general-purpose room. Two-toned designs in stripes are among the best. Green for a room that gets little sun should be avoided. Grays are excellent and may be striped with a small-figured colorful design. Use bird decorations and landscapes in hall. Chambers should be done in light colors. As they have less wall ornamentation, figured papers in small flower designs may be used, but selected with great care, as nothing must disturb the restful appearance of the room. The sick spend many hours looking at the walls, and nurses will tell you how irritating a grotesque design or harsh colorings may become.

While on the subject of sleeping-rooms, let me say a good word in behalf of growing girls having their very own. As soon as a girl has a place where she is free to do as she pleases, the home-making spirit will begin to develop. Girls instinctively love what is beautiful. They also love art, and if they can have a sort of sanctuary of their own, you will soon find self-expression in their surroundings. A place of their very own also encourages reading and thoughts.

How Those Pimples Vanish!

Stuart's Calcium Wafers Are Wonders to Aid the Skin in Clearing Itself of Pimples and Skin Imperfections.

Complexion creams, soaps, vitamines and such things come and go out. Stuart's Calcium Wafers keep right on as the rational way to clear the skin of pimples, redness, roughness and such imperfections. Their first action is to aid the system to get rid of the mass of waste products that seep into the blood and are apt to be absorbed into the tissues.

Then the Calcium itself is one of the essential elements that the system naturally absorbs and utilizes, particularly in keeping the skin in health. Thus there are decided benefits to be had from these wonder wafers, for no matter how pimply the skin, a box or two, cannot fail to show marked changes. There begins to show the delicate rose-tint of the skin, it is smoother, of finer texture and with any ordinary attention to bodily hygiene the complexion soon shows wonderful improvement.

Get a 60 cent box of Stuart's Calcium Wafers of any druggist and then you may count on a complexion worth having.

Be Careful What You Wash Your Hair With

If you want to keep your hair in good condition, be careful what you wash it with.

BETTY COMPSON
Famous Movie Star

Many soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much free alkali. This dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle, and is very harmful.

Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo (which is pure and entirely greaseless), is much better than anything else you can use for shampooing, as this cannot possibly injure the hair.

Simply put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water, then moisten the hair with water and rub the Mulsified in. It will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather, and cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. The lather rinses out easily, and removes every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and it leaves it fine and silky, bright, fluffy and easy to manage.

Something About Necks

SOAP is one of civilization's chief necessaries, yet sometimes we are a little too prone to use it too lavishly, and for the woman who cares about her skin this is a bad habit indeed. Hands washed too often grow hard of texture and a little rough so that they gather more dirt than ever and need more and more washing. Necks which are vigorously scrubbed at least twice a day to remove the dust from the air and the clothing, or the marks of a necklet of some kind, soon become lined in the places where, as more years are added unto us, there are apt to be creases.

How about your neck? Does it look a little weatherbeaten? This may be because of too much washing with soap. Suppose we try another method for a time. Wash the neck at night with warm soapy water, then rinse in warm water, using a cloth to apply the water, then dash on cold water. After this rub just a little cold cream into the skin of the neck, especially along the places where horizontal creases are beginning to show or where you see them on other women's necks. If you haven't them, be thankful, but take precautions to ward off their appearance. Always rub across a line, or crease, never the same way the crease lies. See that all the cold cream is absorbed. In the morning, just a little tepid water is all that is needed. If your fur or your cloak collar or any other article worn next the neck leaves a dingy mark, remove it with cold cream rather than soap. A little cold cream laid over the dark line or spot and then wiped with a cloth, will take the dirt away with it. Never rub cold cream into a skin which has the least dirt or dust upon it, as you only grind the dirt into the pores, but you can wipe off dirt with cold cream, without rubbing.

Almond meal is another good thing to use on the skin of the neck. Bathe the neck in warm water first then rub with almond meal.

It is an odd thing, but blackheads sometimes appear on the neck, especially on the crease which comes down from the ear under the chin. Also they sometimes lodge behind the ear. Keep a sharp watch out for such defects, and at the first hint of one squeeze out the contents of the pore with the forefingers of both hands about which you have put a thickness of soft towel or other cloth. Don't get the idea, either, that the neck ends at the collar bone. It used to in our grandmother's day, but not now! The necks of our gowns disclose not only two or three inches below the collar bone in front, but also quite a little bit of skin and flesh in the back, that used to be covered in our grandmother's time. So, when making your toilet, use your cold cream over all this portion, and when powdering, powder over it.

Answers to Questions

GIRL OF THE FOREST.—I imagine, for your age, 120 pounds would be a "slim" weight for your height. When you are older, you should weigh about 135 pounds. As to reducing your waist and hips, that is not necessary at fourteen, although exercises such as I should give you for reducing, if you were older, are excellent for you to practice. They will not reduce you beyond normal. I will tell you some to practice daily. When you are older your hips and bust should be about 38 inches, and your waist 28 inches, as the latter is always ten inches less than the bust after the figure is fully developed. Of course your figure is not developed yet, and you will have to wait three or four years before you will know what your figure is going to be; therefore it would be foolish to think about it now. There is one thing you can think about, though, and it will be good both for your health and your future figure, as well as your complexion, and that is what foods you should eat. If, as you say, you want to "grow tall quickly but not fat," you should not eat many sweets. Drink milk, eat bread and butter, fresh fruits when obtainable, green vegetables, a certain amount of meat, but not pies, much cake, or candy. At your age you need well-cooked cereals with cream and sugar for breakfast, soft-boiled eggs and toast; of course no coffee or tea, but a good glass of fresh milk. And for other meals eat as many vegetables as possible, drink milk, eat fruits. Do not eat between meals; if there is a long wait between meals, and you are hungry, as growing young people often are, drink a glass of milk or eat a piece of bread and butter or a raw apple, but don't nibble between meals and thus form the bad habit of "piecing." If you have plenty of apples, eat an apple before going to bed, one for breakfast, and if you like one in the afternoon. When you haven't fresh fruit for breakfast, eat stewed prunes or a baked apple, or stewed apricots which have been soaked over night, then cooked slowly for an hour or more. As to colors which are good to wear with your light auburn hair and hazel eyes, here are some suggestions: gold-bronze, soft fawn color, light corn yellow, light rust color, olive green, dark mouse-gray, blue-green, dark blue, medium terra cotta. It is possible you could wear a blue-violet, with a little gray shade to it, and with this silver or purple could be used to trim; with the first four colors, your trimming would better be of the same color, perhaps a tiny bit darker in shade but of some other material, as of satin or velvet; for the five other colors, a corn color or light brick-red could be used as trimming with the dark russet; a yellow or peacock blue with the olive green; orange or corn-flower blue or grass green with the gray; dull pink or a darker green with the blue-green; and gold or light blue or vermilion with the dark blue. These are merely suggestions without having seen the exact shade of your hair; they will help you, however, in choosing clothes, for you can hold materials of these colors against your face and see how they harmonize or contrast. Your shoes are not too large. It is fashionable to wear a shoe at least a size or a size and a half longer than the actual measurement of the foot, but have the shoe fit well in width. Now for the exercises, which I hope you will practice faithfully:

Exercise for Hips and Abdomen

Standing erect, with chest out, chin slightly raised, toes out, stomach held in, hands on hips with fingers forward, thumbs back. Now without bending the knees, bend forward at the waist-line. Keep the chin up and do not allow the head to drop forward as you take this movement. When you feel a strain in the calves of the legs, resume the upright position, breathing in slowly as you do so. Now bend backward as far as you can at the waist-line, expelling the breath as you do so, the knees will have to bend as you lean backward, but only then. Repeat ten or fifteen times.

Another Good Exercise

Take same position, with the exception of having the arms extended above the head, thumbs touching, palms facing out, elbows stiff. Now advance the left foot about eighteen inches. Keeping the right leg stiff, throw the arms down and attempt to touch the floor in front of the toes of the right foot. This foot, of course, is pointed at an angle. The left knee will bend a very little. At first you will not be able to touch the floor, but come as near to it as you can. Each day's practice will make the exercise easier for you. Breathe in, when in standing position, expel the breath as you throw the arms out and down, breathing in again as you resume the standing position. Always inhale and exhale slowly.

LENORA.—I am sorry that the question you ask cannot be answered any more definitely than to say that I use many varieties of face cream from time to time. There are many good creams on the market. Watch COMFORT and other magazines, and you will be safe in choosing a cream that is widely advertised, for proprietors cannot afford to spend large sums of money for advertising, month after month, unless their product is so good that people continue to buy.

SUNFLOWER.—Exercise will help the layer of fat at the back of your neck, but dieting is the only thing that will really remove it and keep it away. You would not be fat there if you were not overweight, and you would not be overweight if you had been careful about not eating sweets, too many of them, and perhaps too much potato, white bread, etc. Cut down the amount of food you eat at any meal, and drop out of your diet all sweets for the time being, lessening also the amount of what we call starchy foods, such as potatoes, rice, macaroni, etc. Now for the exercises. To do any good, you will have to practice these exercises twice a day for a number of times. First, drop your head forward on your chest, letting it hang as if you had no power to raise it, then roll it around on your shoulders, left, back, right, forward, left, right, back, etc. Do this over and over. Next, standing erect, with hands on hips, chest thrust forward, press the head back toward the spine as far as you can; resume erect position, press back again, and repeat ten or twenty times. Then, holding head erect, twist it around as if you were trying to look at the middle of your back, turn first to the left in this way, then back to center again, then twist to right, back to center. Hold chin up as you do this, and chest out. Massage will help, also, to do away with some of the fat. Lay steaming cloths upon that portion of your neck, using Turkish bath towels of small size or Turkish wash-cloths, and replacing with fresh ones as fast as heat begins to vanish. Then wrap the neck in a dry towel and let cool, after which massage with a firm pressure and with fingers dipped in a tiny bit of cold cream so there will not be too much friction. Let the fingers of the two hands meet at the middle of the back of the neck, then massage across the fat place, to the left and back, with the right hand, to the right and back with the left hand, pressing firmly. This, to do any good, must be done daily, morning and night.

R. B.—The first thing to do in regard to your bust is probably to change the style of corset you are wearing. You do not tell me your bust measurement so I cannot tell whether you are over-size or not. At your age it is inadvisable to attempt to reduce the bust. Your bust should be about 37½ inches. For a large bust it is essential to wear a low-bust corset, one that does not come more than a couple of inches above the waist and stops below the bust at least an inch. A large bust can be made to look much larger by pushing it up with the support of a corset. You should wear strong brassieres, of firm cloth, fastening in the back with hooks and eyes, and pinned or hooked down to the corset in front. This will keep the bust firm without shoving it up. Your corset should, of course, be held down by two garters in front; one or two on each side; and two in the back. If you will dress in this way, I think you will find that your bust does not look too large. The other thing you can do is to practice arm-and-chest exercises, preferably the former.

Arm Exercise, Good for Bust Reduction

Standing erect, toes out, head up, heels together, chest elevated, hold the arms out horizontally on a level with the shoulders, palms facing forward. Now throw them back as if trying to make the backs of your hands meet in the middle of your back, being careful not to let the arms drop below shoulder level. Of course they will not meet, but you must make just as much effort as if they could. Throw the arms forward again, letting the palms of the hands meet at arms' length in front of the body, on a level with the shoulders. Make these motions with much force, and practice fifteen or twenty times, twice a day.

NORTH DAKOTA.—You would have to visit a bookstore that carried all the current magazines, and look them over to find an issue which carries what you want. No magazine carries such illustrations except once in a long time. You might write to the various fashion magazines whose names you know and ask if they can send you an issue with such illustrations in it. Sorry not to be of more help to you.

NEILLSVILLE.—Yes, if you ask at a drugstore, you can get the article you want. They will be able to tell you what it is. And in the meantime, massage your scalp, night and morning. Each month, nearly, I have given directions for this care of the scalp and there is nothing which is more beneficial. I wish you would read the answers to questions in last month's COMFORT, for there was a good deal of advice in relation to hair, and the point very strongly stressed that the first thing to do was to see that one's general health was up to par.

P. OF TENN.—Indeed I am glad to hear from you, and we will see what can be done to build you up a little. You are below weight at present, but at sixteen so much of the energies of the body are required to add inches to one's height and to take care of all the changes that are taking place in the body, that there isn't much left, ordinarily, for "filling out." Your friends are right, you will certainly fill out as you grow older. By the time you are eighteen, you will probably be writing me to see how you can lose a few pounds! In the meantime, there is no reason why we shouldn't

CHAPTER XVII.

"A WOMAN KILLED HIM."

Why ever didn't you come before, you great
!"
rs. Gibbs, pale and handsome in her dressing-
n, waited for Brookes at the wine-cellar door, aging her hands wildly. "If you knew all this t have you been doing?"
He lammed me across the ankles with someg, and knocked me silly, didn't I tell you?"
He! Do you mean Marchmont?" she cried, ving breathless at the open hole.
I mean"—with a string of epithets—"that il Lesard!"
Then you're a fool," she returned. "Lesard uldn't trouble with you. More likely it's po-
! I never believed in this country house busi-—never."
he swore quite as volubly at Brookes as she it through the square opening, nimbly enough, sidering her size and her flowing garments.
passage did not appall her as it did Jacky; and Marchmont were familiar with every h of it; but even she had to wait for Brookes his light till she rounded the turn and saw rchmont's candle still burning in the heavy air.
Jim!" she cried. "Jim, where are you?"
ough Mr. Marchmont's name was Paul.
But as she called she almost fell over some-ng that lay in the slippery pool—and knew ere Marchmont was and where he would be ever. With a sobbing, muffled, cry she was on knees beside him, dragging open his shirt to the wound. She took no heed of the folded ndkerchief that must have fallen to the ground, it no longer lay where Jacky had placed it.
"He'll bleed to death," she moaned, trying to p the blood with her hands.
"He's gone now! The butler was shivering; kept his head turned away from the blood that ined over the stones.
"He's alive, I tell you! My Jim's alive. I've seen dead men!" she retorted fiercely, tearing the flounce from her satin petticoat and bandaging the wound with skill. "I won't let him die here Catch this and drag it tight!" She cursed his slowness as he limped reluctantly toward her, swearing at his squeamishness as he kept his face averted from the blood. "If you'd come before——"

Her torrent of words stopped short on her lips; she had seen Marchmont's face turn gray. The hand she held was suddenly leaden.

He was dead!

The woman who had followed him like a faithful dog had been too late to save him. All his sins and schemes had come to this.

"He's dead!" Brookes's voice was thick. "My God, what are we to do? We're ruined."

But she could not answer. She was swaying where she knelt. Nothing mattered to her but that Jim Adams—known as Paul Marchmont—was dead.

"Think," he repeated, "what we're to do!" But he saw she neither heard nor heeded, and if morning came and caught them in this plight nothing could save them. Courage he had none, and his cunning had deserted him. He fell back on the only thing that came to his mind.

"Are you going to let Lesard get off?" he cried. "It must have been Lesard who murdered him!" But he could hardly get the words out, for they turned his stomach.

"Let him get off—Lesard?" she repeated dully, and then as his meaning reached her brain sprang to her feet.

"By the Lord, Lesard shall swing!" she cried.

Brookes was frightened—strangely frightened.

"You can't tell," he began, but she cut him short, with a superb gesture. She pointed to the dead man. "I loved him this many a year," she said grandly. "I can do anything for Jim."

"And if you lay it on Lesard the whole of England will know that Marchmont was just the head of the gang!" he returned, forcing his shifty eyes to meet hers. "There's more to think of than Lesard."

"What does it matter now?" she said obstinately, "Jim's dead."

"And you're alive—and if Lesard is lagged he knows enough to let you rot in jail," desperately. "And you never could prove anything against him, I know that; but he'd ruin us. Do you think because Marchmont's dead the whole world is?"

He turned from her with sudden recollection; he was not doing what he had meant to do. He went toward the place where the jewels had been hidden. If his cry of dismay rang falsely she did not notice.

"They're gone—everything's gone!" He knelt staring at the empty hole.

Greed and greed alone pierced the woman's strange hardness. She began to cry. If the hoarded jewels were gone she was a beggar, for Marchmont had spent all his money on Hamilton Place, and they had lived on his spoils ever since.

Brookes got up and stood looking at her.

"We'd better get out," he muttered; there's no use of staying. If we're found here with him we'll swing." He gulped at the last word, as if it sickened him. "And we can't do him any good," glancing fearfully over his shoulder.

Mrs. Gibbs stopped crying.

"Look here," she said, "if you bolt and leave him alone in the dark, to be found or rot, I know who I'll put the blame on, and that's you!"

Brookes's stare was ghastly.

"I've made up my mind what to do," she continued, "and you've got to help me. We'll carry him up to his room and then call the police. I'll arrange the room; they'll think burglars killed him. I don't want any one to find out he was any other than Paul Marchmont, or that this house was queer."

The plan was better than Brookes's, and yet, would he have to touch that dead man?

"How can we get him up?" hesitating.

"You and I must carry him. There's no one in the house I can trust except one girl. And if it was Lesard did it, he can just take his chance. I won't tell. But if he did it I'll pay him out, whether he's suspected or not. You're sure it was him?" sharply.

"Sure!" His teeth chattered as he answered.

But she took the candle and made a round of the place, bad enough in the beginning, reeking of murder now. Presently she pounced on the knife, and knew it for Marchmont's own. The sheath was still in his trousers pocket. But it was not he who had killed himself with stab after stab.

The knife handle was sticky with blood, and she remembered Lesard's fastidiously clean hands.

"If he threw that down he'd wash his hands," she said. "Go and look if he left any marks; he might have been cut himself. Curse this stone floor that doesn't take footprints!"

With chattering teeth the butler took the candle from her, and searched the cut stone on the river edge on his knees. Suddenly he turned and the candle in his hand flung a radiance on his face, the face that Judas has worn throughout all ages.

"What did I say!" he whispered, for he had found what he was looking for. "Come here."

Mrs. Gibbs seized the candle with a quick oath, kneeling on the very verge of the stream.

There, on the stone brink, was the print of a hand in blood that was still red, but she stared at in blank amazement.

Fine, small, delicate, those outstretched fingers, that narrow palm, had never been Lesard's! Her own hand was small for a woman of her size, and she stretched it silently over the bloody marks. It overlapped them everywhere.

"It wasn't Lesard's!" She began to tremble violently. "It was a woman—that killed him.

"A woman! What woman?" Neither question or amazement rang naturally.

"I don't know, but I'll find out!" and at the vicious fury of her livid face the butler rejoiced that at least it was not his hand-print she was measuring.

She got up, gritting her teeth. Was there some one else—had Marchmont all this time deceived her? That he was not over and above faithful she knew; he had never tried to hide it. But if there had been any other woman in his confidence who had turned against him that woman's life should pay for it.

Brookes, more ghastly than the corpse, did not dare to refuse as she signed to him to take the dead man's shoulders while she lifted his feet. But terror alone forced him.

Along the slimy passage they carried their burden painfully, Brookes gripping the candle with two fingers, strangely careful that it should not drop hot grease on the dead face that lolled backward horribly, bobbing up and down at each step.

At the entrance of the cellar Mrs. Gibbs stopped. Stripping off her dressing-gown she rolled it round Marchmont.

"We don't want to leave marks," she said dully, her mind running on that other woman who had killed him. "I can burn this!"

And at the silent acquiescence of the butler they went on again, treading softly through the silent house, not daring to whisper lest some wakeful servant might come out on them, drowsy-eyed. And at last they stood in Marchmont's own sitting-room, where the cards still lay disordered, as he and the housekeeper had left them when she went to bed.

"Why not his bedroom?" said Brookes wretchedly.

Somehow it seemed less ghastly for a dead man to lie on his bed than here in the disorder of playing-cards, cigar ends and empty soda-water bottles. Could the butler ever go up-stairs and to bed with this dead man lying down here in his own blood?

"Because this is best! Could any one," pointing scornfully to the window, on the level of the ground, "get in a window two stories up, or get out without leaving footmarks in the garden? There won't be any footmarks looked for here, the stone terrace couldn't be expected to hold them. And the gravel couldn't, either, in this rain. Hear it!" she paused, and the drumming of the heavy downpour sounded to the miserable butler like the feet of a hundred men.

He could only watch as she took the dressing-gown from the body and laid it on the floor in the same attitude it had been in when she found it. It was growing cold. It went to her heart that she could not lay it out, and let it stiffen with decent hands clasped on the breast. The half-closed eyes maddened her. She turned quickly to the butler.

"Come back to the cellar," she ordered; I've forgotten something."

He dared not say no. Better go with her than stay with the dead. He saw her catch up a rug from the floor, and did not even ask her why.

Half an hour later as they came from the cellar for the last time, he knew without asking.

She was carrying the rug stretched flat between her hands, too wise to roll it, and it was red and wet with the blood she had wiped from the cellar stones.

Nauseated, he turned from her as she placed it under Marchmont. No one could doubt now where he had been struck down.

"Now," she whispered, "put out the light, pull up the blinds, leave the window open, and we'll go. You can find him in the morning."

"Me!" he recoiled so terror-stricken that she pitied him. "I—can't!" He went to the whiskey decanter and drank from it. "If we don't say anything about the cellar," he muttered, "I suppose you're not going to mention that hand-print to the police."

"You fool! There's other ways than telling," she retorted. "If they find it for themselves they'll be far keener than if they're told. Mind, now, you never heard of the cellar!"

He wished with all his soul he never had, as she picked up her stained dressing-gown and wiped her hands on it, so that something fell out of its folds on the floor.

"Look at that!" she cried. "It's his own handkerchief, all folded and soaked with water. Some one must have put it on him. Do you think whoever killed him got frightened and tried to stop the blood? But it wasn't on him, either, when I found him!"

Brooks had more whiskey before he answered.

"Well—what of it?" he gulped again at the decanter.

"That's a woman's work. A woman would do that—never a man like Lesard. Put down that stuff! I'm going up-stairs."

She put out the lamp as she spoke, and the butler bolted from the room before her, afraid of that which lay stark behind him. But the woman did not follow.

Instead, she sat down, alone in the dark with the dreadful loneliness of the watcher by the dead; sat there with the man who had been her lover and master till the dawn began to grow livid in the east. It seemed to her half-crazed brain that if she could have laid him out and set lighted candles at his head and feet half her pain would have fled. But at last she, too, was forced to leave him.

Painfully, strip by strip, almost inch by inch, she burned her dressing-gown in her own grate; luckily, it was made of flannelette and inflammable as tinder.

But her iron blower was red hot before the thing was gone.

"Mary James has good wits!" she thought suddenly of the girl. "But I'd better go and warn

Dentition

WE take dentition or teething as the subject for this month's talk, knowing that there is a great deal of misunderstanding in regard to the teething of babies. The coming of the teeth is absolutely a normal physiological thing, but often there are symptoms that show up during this time that are very disagreeable and dangerous. I heard a learned professor say that the coming of the teeth was a normal growth of a baby, and did not cause any more disturbance than the growth of the nails and hair. He was a bachelor, and while his ideas along this line may sound scientific, they are far from the truth, and any mother who has sat at the bedside of a baby with high fever, swollen gums, twitching almost to the point of convulsions will appreciate this fact. The first or milk teeth are twenty in number, and are cut in the following order: the two lower central incisors (front teeth) from the seventh to the ninth month, often earlier, sometimes later, after a lapse of five or six weeks the two upper central incisors are cut, then next comes the two lower lateral incisors, and then the two upper lateral incisors.

After an interval the four front molars appear, followed by the four canines, and last of all the four posterior molars, the whole set being cut by the end of the second year. Now it must not be supposed that there is any strict timekeeping in the appearance of the teeth, for although there is a pretty definite order of occurrence, the lower incisors may appear early or late and the others follow, sometimes several at once. I have seen babies five months old with four teeth, and have also seen babies fourteen months old without a sign of a tooth. In both cases the babies seemed normal and healthy. Teething is usually held to be the cause of many ailments, and, without doubt, in many cases this is not true.

The teeth come at a time, as a rule, when the baby's diet is being changed to one of greater variety, and the diarrhea, fever and vomiting that often occurs at this time may be caused by indigestion and not toothcutting.

This much, however, must be allowed, that the growth of a child is one of stages, and there are periods during which unusual progress is made; teething is one of them.

Increased activity of all physiological processes at work necessarily implies greater risk of friction between one organ and another.

In this sense this makes the time of teething a time of peril; the dangers are great from disorders of many kinds, convulsions, bronchitis, diarrhea, each of which claims its victims.

These diseases are not a consequence of the eruption of the teeth, but a part of a general activity of growth and development, to cause which teething and morbid conditions both in a sense contribute.

Some babies are inclined to have a cold when a tooth comes through, the eyes run, nose also; there is much sneezing and may be some cough, or fever and diarrhea; baby is restless and fretful.

This restlessness may become a wildness and excitement of manner, then develop irregular muscular movements with contraction of feet and hands, with eyes rolled up with a staring expression.

There may be excessive dribbling of the saliva, and frequently biting anything they can put their hands on, indigestion is common, and there may be an eruption on the body. Convulsions are not a common ailment of teething and many authorities claim they are seldom seen unless associated with rickets.

The dribbling of the saliva is a peculiar symptom, and the cause is not easy to explain.

In the treatment of these varied conditions, to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and without doubt the timely management of slight disorders in all probability arrests more serious disorders. To control the excessive muscular movements often averts the fever, a neglected cold may become bronchitis or pneumonia.

It is always a safe thing to clear out bowels with half-grain doses of calomel or teaspoonful doses of castor oil.

If the baby is very feverish or restless, or there seems to be any danger of convulsions, do not hesitate to use the gum lancet to relieve the pressure, and in severe cases should uncover the tooth.

This may seem to be radical treatment, but it gives relief, the slight bleeding relieves the head symptoms. In gums slightly swollen, swabbing the gums with Glyco-Thymoline gives great relief.

Two-grain doses of bromide of soda, in solution, two or three times a day quiets the restlessness and does not do any harm.

Just a few words in regard to the care of the teeth: a baby's teeth should be cleaned, as soon as they appear, with soft cloth or cotton, and this should be kept up. When a baby has two teeth, side by side, particles of food can and do get in between them.

The subject of dental decay, although one of interest and concern to anyone having the care of children, is hardly within the province of this paper, but keep the baby's teeth clean, and at the first sign of decay take the child to a competent dentist.

This is most important, as decayed teeth cause indigestion, and without doubt many children become food bolters on account of decayed teeth.

A child cannot properly chew its food when the things to do it with are lacking.

Subject for next month, Flatulence or Colic of Babies.

Questions and Answers

INDIGESTION.—What can I do for my four-months-old baby, as she has a swollen stomach and cries from colic, also has a breaking out all over her body? She vomits up her food a great deal. What can I do for myself, as I have indigestion?

MRS. W. E. S., Pasco, Wash.
MRS. A. L., Chinquapin, N. C.

A.—Your baby has indigestion, and if she is nursing without doubt your indigestion is handed along to her in the milk, and the breaking out is caused by the indigestion. Keep your own bowels regular with teaspoonful doses of Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada, and after meals take two-teaspoonful doses of Elix. Lactated Pepsin. Eat slowly and chew your food thoroughly.

WEANING BABY.—I am writing for advice and help, as I am all run down, feel badly all the time, weigh but ninety-eight pounds. Am nursing a thirteen-months-old baby who is very well and strong, weighs twenty-three pounds. MRS. L. J. P., Murfreesboro, N. C.

A.—Wean baby at once, as nursing him is too much for you; anyway, baby should have been weaned when he was eleven months old.

Stop taking these advertised remedies, drink a quart of milk a day, get out in the open air all you can. Get plenty of sleep, and three times a day take dessertspoonful doses of Neoferrum, or Pepto-Mangan (Gudes'). These things will build up your general health, and you will soon find yourself normal in every way.

GOITER.—I have had goiter for several years and as it seems to get worse am writing to you for advice. The enlargement is across the lower half of my neck and feels as if it were pressing on the windpipe. I get short of breath if I walk or work fast. I am two months pregnant and wish to know if there is anything I can do aside from an operation?

MRS. C. H. L., Scobey, Mont.

A.—There are several different types of goiters, but would suggest the following treatment: two-teaspoonful doses of Syrup of Hydriodic acid (Gardner's) in one-fourth glass of water, after meals, three times a day.

Locally, should apply as poultices on cloth every night some Iodex, put up by Menley & James, New York City. This treatment will saturate the system with iodin, which is lacking in these cases.

INFANT'S CLOTHES.—What should an infant's clothes consist of for baby that is born in February or March?

MRS. A. A. L., Minneapolis, Minn.,
MRS. G. E. S., Stoneville, N. C.

A.—An infant's outfit varies according to the amount of money to be invested, the same as a person's clothing, but a baby should have the following: three shirts, part wool; three flannel bands about five inches wide, torn, not hemmed; three outing flannel nightdresses; four dresses or slips; three flannel or cotton and wool gertrude petticoats, two little shoulder blankets, two pairs woolen stockings, and at least three dozen diapers.

SLEEPLESS BABY.—What can I do for my fifteen-months-old baby, as he does not sleep nights, stomach rolls, then he cries out? He has done this from birth.

MRS. C. J. F., Houston, Tex.

A.—Your baby has indigestion, and this rolling you hear is gas and, without doubt, causes pain. Should put him on milk and water, half and half at first, then gradually increase the percentage of milk until he is taking pure milk, adding tablespoonful of lime-water to each feeding.

I should give him teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia, often enough to keep bowels regular. Give him a little oatmeal gruel strained.

Do not give fruit or acids in any form.

ANEMIA.—What can I do for my fourteen-year-old daughter who has poor blood? She is thin and pale and wounds do not heal properly. MRS. M., Duke, N. C.

A.—Build up her general health with plenty of sleep, quart of milk a day, and after meals three times a day give her dessertspoonful doses of Neoferrum.

MATERNITY CORSETS.—Does it harm baby for mother to wear maternity corsets, and how long should they be worn? Should I use pinked or stitched bands?

MRS. C. M. G., Queen City, Texas.

A.—No, they do not harm baby, and you can wear them until baby arrives. Should use the pinked edge bands.

FRIGHTENED MOTHER.—A few days ago I was badly frightened by a mouse and as I am an expectant mother am worrying for fear I may have harmed baby.

MRS. D. D. C., Graham, Ga.

A.—Absolutely no danger at all.

Will the sisters please send in some odd names for children.

Lovingly, MRS. ETHEL TILLOTSON.

FT. SMITH, 505 So. 17TH ST., ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

My name is Edward Louis Cote. I am ten months old and weigh twenty-one pounds, have eight teeth and can almost walk. My hair is light brown and my eyes are very blue. My mother has read COMFORT since she was a little girl. Both my grandmothers take it. I want them to see my picture in COMFORT.

Very truly yours, EDWARD LOUIS COTE.

If you want to sell your dog, Edward, I'll buy him, and it would be quite all right if you came along with him to see that he got good care.—Ed.

ROSWELL, 419 EAST 4TH ST., N. MEX.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I find many helpful and cheering letters in this department but I like best of all those telling how you got your home. We have sacrificed a great deal in order to have a roof over our heads and do away with a landlord's profiteering.

We first bought a lot on a pretty little street for which we paid one hundred dollars down and two hundred in quarterly payments. We had quite a struggle to pay that amount in six months' time as we had four children and ourselves to feed and other bills to pay. While we were paying it we lived in a government tent, 16x16. This was under some large cottonwood trees and we spent the summer there very comfortably. We tried to save money to build a small cottage but were not successful. I heard of a little 18x20-foot shack that was for sale and for which we paid $40.00. It cost $25.00 to have it hauled two and one-half miles, $65.00 in all and we couldn't have gotten lumber for that, to say nothing of carpenters' wages. Husband and I started to make it comfortable enough so we could live in it during the winter as tenting was too cold. It cost $2.60 for a carpenter to fix the windows and doors and while husband was putting tarred paper on the roof I was filling the cracks with rags and helping put on white angora paper. The paper and roofing which we put on ourselves, cost us $18.10, a total of $21.35.

We began buying the lot about the first of February and were in our shack the last of July. That shows that a couple can have a home if they have the determination. Of course they have to put up with hardships. We moved the little house to the rear of the lot and when we get able intend to build in front of it and use this one for summer kitchen or storage room. My husband gets less than one hundred dollars a month. He gives me his check and I save every nickel. Now if he gets sick or loses his job we won't have to move. It cost forty dollars to connect the city water but we were offered four hundred dollars for the lot before we put the shack on it, so it was worth it.

I will close by asking the sisters to send me flower seeds to beautify our lot. I will call it our COMFORT flower garden.

With love, MRS. PETE FAHRLENDER.

MARYSVILLE, R. R. 1, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL COMFORT SISTERS:

COMFORT is a fine paper. I could not keep house without it. I have taken it for over thirty years and this is the first time I have ever written to it but if I see this in print I will come again and tell you about Washington and other places, as I have done a lot of traveling.

I have had very little schooling, on account of ness and there was a large family, seven girls and boys (another boy died), so it kept us all very busy the oldest had to stay at home and help with the My dear father and mother are still living and the care of them. How many of you look after dear parents as you should? You will be old some day and you will know better how to mother feel if you are cross to them. Remember are like little children again. We never know they went through for us so let's take good care while we have them with us and we will get our some day. And as for the mother-in-law, one "I just will not have my mother-in-law with you can it is best all around to live in separate but if you will not have your husband's mother expect to have your own mother live with you is your husband's mother-in-law. I had the mother-in-law. She has been dead eight years. band likes my mother so we have no family We are both old fashioned as you would say happy. We were married 25 years ago the November, our silver wedding, and can say we to have our first quarrel.

I like to see more letters from the brothers of them are very good.

I will tell you how I fixed my bedroom. I second-hand bed, dresser, washstand and two very little money. I removed the old paint pieces by dissolving a can of lye in hot soda ing it over the furniture with an old brush rinsed with clear water and let it dry. After gave it two coats of white enamel and it was the room, which was fifteen feet square with dows. I papered the walls with striped paper and white, because it was low. I used a narrow out border of blue, as the room was to be all white. I painted the floor pearl gray and the white. Then I had three oval rugs which I cotton rags dyed in three shades of blue and The curtains were of white with side hangings I made a box couch to put at the foot of the hold coverings. This I covered with dark blue seat with cushions of blue and white, also cushions chair and rocker. The pictures were framed and the bed coverings were in blue and white. an attractive room.

I am five feet tall and weigh 200 pounds brown hair and blue eyes and am always smiling a small foot, a 5½, and a large hand. Take my glove. Don't say I am too fat for what can I get thin? I do not eat so much and I work hard. fifty years old the 17th of February.

With love to the sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson little for the brothers,

MRS. C. E. WEBB.

P. S. I love the Sisters' Corner,
I love the Fancy Work,
I love the Editorials,
But I love the whole COMFORT best.

FRUITLAND PARK, FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

For the benefit of the reader who asked how to floor covering of sacks and paint, I'm writing method.

First, have floors clean, then lay down two or layers of newspapers, then the sacks that have cleaned. They should be fitted to the floor and laid perfectly smooth, the edges lapped and After this is done a filler is applied. This may at home of flour and water cooked to the consistency thick starch or it may be bought all ready Whichever is used, it is well to brush it into ing with a stiff brush. When this is thoroughly apply two coats of any good floor paint, letting dry hard before the second is applied.

Yours truly, MRS. W. C. CRANE.

STROUD, OKLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my first attempt at writing a letter to the ters' Corner. I have read COMFORT ever since I to read. I think that Crumbs of Comfort is one its many delights and is too little mentioned. food for thought. I liked this: "Little acts of ness are like bags of lavender and serve to every object around them."

I see that most of the sisters describe themselves I will too for it gives the readers a chance to have mental picture of the writer and that is more ing than guesswork. I am twenty-five years old, sometimes young, five feet, nine inches around one hundred and sixty-five. Have black hair, so straight it would bend the iron before it would curl, brown eyes but as I am used there is some green mixed with the brown but it shows when I'm on mischief bent. My complexion would be called olive but it is covered with tan and I've about forgotten what it is like. I have been married six years and a half, and am the mother of boys living. The oldest one died with measles would be five years old if he had lived. Bert Wilson is his mamma's pal. He was four last June and learning very fast. Is nearly through his primer can print most of the letters. He has a small blackboard and chalk and it amuses him as well as him to learn his letters both written and printed. has committed to memory the four verses of "Twinkle, twinkle, little star." This will sound like a but I wish all of you could have seen my little cracking walnuts and the little chickadees and hopping right into his lap and eating kernels from broken pieces in his hands, as he sat on the He also loves the big, fat bluejays, says the blue are his and the red ones mine. He knows how love the red birds. What is more inspiring than hear the old fellow sing his "Good cheer, good cheer, cheer," from the top of an oak tree on the side. How well Mrs. Porter pictured him in her "The Song of the Cardinal." There are many that teach us the wonders of the Most High but I hear that bird sing out his "good cheer," I surely He must be somewhere near.

How many readers of COMFORT are actively interested in saving the life of the wild? There are too few us now that are and if folks don't wake up it is too late, we are going to be without some of most precious gifts. The Cubby Bear page also us a lot about wild life of birds and animals, the stories are for children, we can read between lines and enjoy them.

Another good thing I found in COMFORT was Mrs. Hutchinson's kitchen plans. It certainly hit the spot, the home conveniences of farmers and people live away from gas, etc. I want a kitchen like some day. I will hang a sweet singing canary in window near the built-in bookcase and put a pot of geraniums in the window above the sink. Couldn't person work with more comfort and joy in a home like that? You young, and old, farmer bridegroom-to-be, take notice. A convenient kitchen makes a happy wife and the two can make a tired man forget work he has done and feel like spreading his face in a broad smile.

I certainly enjoyed Mrs. Marsh's and Mrs. Porter's letters. I think letters like these are worth keeping to read over again.

I am the oldest of a family of six, two girls and four boys. My sister, four years younger than I am, is married. We lost our mother last April. She was my chum and best friend.

I wish someone who knows would tell me how to get rid of away rose pests so that the fragrance wouldn't be lost.

With love to all and best wishes,

MRS. LILLIAN PENNYPACKER.

DRAKETOWN, R. R. 1, CAL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I think nearly every subject has been discussed except the garden and flower subject. I am a great lover of the outdoor world. Although I have a dear husband and four small children to love and care for, I manage some time to work in my yard and garden.

Let me tell you flower lovers how I grow chrysanthemums as large as saucers. In the fall or early spring I dig holes deep enough to hold a peck or more of well rotted compost. This I mix with the top soil. Then I take a rooted slip from the old stalk and set in my new hill. Keep this plant worked and fertilized with guano and nitrate of soda. Soon it sends out buds. These I keep pinched out until August or September when I allow three or four to each plant. These will form buds, all of which keep pinched out except the center or largest bud. Be sure they are staked well for the blooms are so large they are easily blown over. Dahlias are also larger if kept disbudded. I wish Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters could have seen my "mums" last fall before Jack Frost changed their color. Some of them were so tall I had to bend them over to pick of them. I have over a dozen colors and about the same of dahlias. We also raise many pretty annuals and perennials such as asters, Sweet Williams, petunias and several others. I can gather blooms all the year except January and February. As soon as the weather begins to get warm in the spring the brave little pansy violets peep out of their bed of green foliage, then the jonquils, narcissus, butter-and-eggs, then the fragrant hyacinths of all colors followed by roses and large buds of snapdragon, phlox, Canterbury bells, then the delias and gladioli. My roses bloomed until Christmas last year. I gathered a large bunch of cream-colored buds for a bride on the 24th of December. I am a great lover of lilies of all kinds but my favorite is the sweet-scented Easter lily.

I have worked very hard in my yard but I think I am repaid by having so many pretty blooms for friends and sick people.

Let us hear from other flower lovers.

Keeping Your Baby Happy

By Barbara Allen

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE mother may be expert in baby hygiene, baby feeding and baby diseases. She may be able to apply the last word in child welfare to the upbringing of her little one but there is quite as vital a thought to be kept in mind in conion with baby lore.

'e must keep the baby happy.

'he little one comes into the world with as velously growing a mind and emotional na- as body. He feels joy and sunshine and love e if not almost as keenly as he feels hunger. gratitude for his mother's smile is as heartas that which he feels for his bottle of warm t. How, then, can we bring the right kind of to our babies that they may grow up emotion- as well as bodily healthy?

'he baby's physical comfort comes first as hav- an important relation to his mental health. home that houses the baby should be sunny, l ventilated and dry. This is not always limi by the income of the family; it is a matter electing the sunny side of the street, the betarrangement of rooms, the better plumbing the wider yard space for the same rental as comfortable conditions. If it is necessary to et a city house, the parents should consider t possibilities of improvements it holds. Can roof be utilized for play space? Is there avail- space for putting on a porch or bay window one side? Can the back yard be made over quately to hold simple apparatus—a swing, s, ladder, balance beam, a sand pile—for the dler's future physical development.

arents who live in small communities or in the ntry will not have this important light and consideration but their housing precautions for baby will be even more important. The base- at or cellar should be dry. If the water supcomes from a well, the well should be so lo- ed that the water is not polluted by dangerous inage from a stable or outhouse. Nearby piles arbage, pools of stagnant water, manure heaps, use or rubbish of any kind are all a menace to yhood and should be disposed of.

unshine makes the baby supremely happy. The le one basks and warms and unfolds in it just does a flower. That room in which the sun nes the longest during the day should be used the baby's living-room. The room should have onstant supply of fresh air, as the baby will much less liable to illness than when he is deved of it. To "air" a room at intervals by ning the windows is well, but a far better plan o have a continual stream of fresh air flowing ough. To do this the windows must be opened opposite sides of the room in order to secure a ss draft, which is always necessary to real vention. When the outside temperature is so exmely low that a comfortable temperature can- be maintained with the windows open, outair should be frequently admitted by opening e the windows on opposite sides and flushing ry part of the room for a few moments. In re weather it is a good plan to air the nursery never the baby is taken into another room. In the mild months the windows should be kept stantly open night and day.

although the baby flowers in the sunshine, e must be taken in his earlier months to vent the eye strain that results from direct s of light. The little one's eyes and head uld be shielded from the direct sunlight, even n he is asleep. Neither should he be aled to lie with his eyes turned directly toward sky, even if it is a gray day. The window ens in a room occupied by a toddler should be made as to lower from the top, or thin wooden ts should be used to keep the lower sash se- e. All screens should be so securely fastened to have no possibility of their being pushed . And the greatest care should be taken to otect the little one from the discomfort and nger of flies and mosquitoes. If the house is adequately screened, the baby's bed or carge should be covered with netting. This should arranged-tent fashion, suspended over a crude, ht framework that the little one may not have discomfort that comes from the fabric touch- his face.

We all know how dependent we are for comting rest upon the right kind of bed. The by's muscles are even more easily tired and imped than ours and his bed needs to be exactsuited to his needs.

The first bed may be made from an ordinary othes-basket or from a light box, such as an ange crate. Later a metal crib with a firm ring is desirable. Table padding or "silence" oth, folded to four thicknesses, makes a very od mattress, because it is readily washable; en washed it should be hung out of doors to y. A sanitary crib mattress may be made by uffing bed ticking with excelsior, which can be newed as often as necessary. Sphagnum moss, straw, can be used in the same way. The matess cover may be made of bed ticking or heavy bleached muslin, which can be emptied, washed, d dried in the sun at intervals. In case exlsior or straw is used for the temporary filling, should be made as level and smooth as possible, d a piece of soft felting or a small comfort ould always be placed over the mattress to ften the rough surface.

It is almost impossible to gauge the discomfort d resultant peevishness that is caused in the dy and mind of the baby by our frequent caress choice of his carriage. The folding cart, light d inexpensive, is valuable because it allows other and baby to go to many places for air d play made impossible by a heavier vehicle. But ese carts should be used only for such trips as re taken when the mother can hold the baby for greater part of the way. Otherwise the little mbs will become cramped and real pain to the bild follow.

The best baby carriage for general street and ursery use measures at least two feet from the round. A carriage lower than this exposes the aby to driving currents of cold and hot air unerneath that are not only uncomfortable but ealth menacing. He is also jeopardized by the erm-laden dust of the street in a lower vehicle. his high carriage should be roomy enough to old under and upper wrappings and a comfortble pillow. It should also allow space for the aby to lie down without any resulting muscular train. The top should be lined with green and e easily and quickly adjustable to meet any eather changes. Strong, well-balanced springs re necessary and the carriage should have wheels vith rubber tires. A strap is imperative but if ne can be arranged to adjust about the baby's vaist, fastening at the back, this is more comortable and efficacious than the ordinary carriage strap.

Next to baby's comfort in his best emotional development is the best home accommodation for his free, muscular play that develops him as almost nothing else does. A creeping pen affords the necessary protection to the baby and gives space for play. It consists of a fence made in four sections, each, say, 18 inches high and four feet long, hinged at three corners and latched at the fourth. Ready-made pens have spindles like a stair rail, so that baby may have something to take hold of when he drives to climb to his feet. As it folds together, the pen can be readily moved about. The floor of the pen should be made of something soft to save the baby from bumps. A cork mat is the cleanest and best material, but a blanket or rug will answer. When the pen is used in the yard a floor of clean white sand will not only protect the clothing but afford the baby who is old enough to play by himself much wholesome entertainment. A combination bed and play pen, the sides of which are covered with wire netting, is on the market. The bottom is made of flexible slats and covered below with matting. The bed has a cover so that baby is completely protected from flies and mosquitoes, and is perfectly safe. It is furnished with casters, or wheels, that it may readily move about, and it may be folded up when not in use.

When it is not possible to purchase one of the ready-made articles an ingenious person may devise a satisfactory play pen from any materials at hand. A board six or eight feet long and a foot wide may be used to fence off a sunny corner of the nursery for a pen.

Only a few well-chosen furnishings and toys are necessary for baby play. No child should use a high chair until his spine is strong and he is able to hold his head erect. The habit of leaving a very young child in a high chair, fastened and alone, for even a comparatively short period of time is dangerous. The rigid sitting position may result in a permanent curvature of the spine. Toys should be large, washable and without sharp edges or points. Any toy that has loose parts such as tassels or bells that can be loosened, and possibly swallowed, should be tabooed. The same rule holds in connection with those toys that are painted or have a woolly covering. A light basket covered with oilcloth that can be easily washed may be used to hold clothes-pins, blocks, spools for stringing, a spoon or two and the other simple home objects that delight a child in its early months just as much as do the more elaborate and expensive toys. This basket and its contents may be easily and frequently washed and it will furnish the baby with endless delight.

The baby who is good is the happy baby. The right kind of home discipline for the child of this early age will not only keep the baby joyful but will help to establish his mental health, for a cross baby often results in a sick or ailing one. Often our thoughtless playing with the baby irritates him. A young, delicate baby needs a good deal of rest, alone. We love to hear him laugh and crow in what we think is delight as we tickle, punch or toss the frail little body, but his resulting glee is usually caused by nervousness, and irritability is bound to follow. The baby should not be rocked, jumped up and down, tossed, shaken or jounced in his crib or carriage. To rest and change the position of his body he should be taken up occasionally and held in his mother's arms, but quietly, and only to rest his muscles.

An older child should be taught to sit on the floor or in his pen or crib during part of his waking hours, or he will be very likely to make too great demands upon the mother's strength. No one who has not tried it realizes how much nervous energy can be consumed in "minding" a baby who can creep or walk about, and who must be continually watched and diverted, and the mother who is taking the baby through this period of life will need to conserve all her strength, and not waste it in useless forms of activity.

When a baby cries simply because he has learned from experience that this brings him what he wants, it is one of the worst habits he can learn, and one which takes all the strength of the mother to break. Crying should cease when the cause has been removed. If the baby cries persistently for no apparent cause, the mother may suspect illness, pain, hunger or thirst. But if finally, after careful scrutiny of all these conditions, no cause for the crying can be found, the baby probably wants to be taken up, walked with, played with, rocked, or to have a light, or to have someone sit by him—the result of his having learned that crying will get him what he wants, and sufficient to make a spoiled, fussy baby, and a household tyrant whose continual demands make a slave of the mother. It is difficult to break up this habit after it has once been formed, but it can be done. After the baby's needs have been fully satisfied he should be put down alone and allowed to cry until he goes to sleep. This may sound cruel, and it is very hard for a young mother to do, but it will usually take only a few nights of this discipline to accomplish the result. In some cases persistent crying may be due to causes not readily discernible by the mother; in this event, the opinion of a good doctor as to the cause of the crying should be sought.

Thumb sucking is another habit that needs attention. To break it up requires resolution and patience on the part of the mother. The thumb or finger must be persistently and constantly removed from the mouth and baby's attention diverted to something else. The sleeve may be pinned or sewed down over the fingers of the offending hand for several days and nights, or the hand may be put in a cotton mitten. Ill-tasting applications have very little effect. There are patent articles for holding the hand from the mouth sold in the stores, but the persistent covering of the hand often works very well. The baby's hands should be set free now and then, especially if he is old enough to use his hands for his toys, and at meal times, to save as much unnecessary strain on his nerves as possible, but with the approach of sleeping time the hand must be covered.

A good deal of the naughtiness of babyhood has its beginnings in physical discomfort. Babies who are properly fed, who are kept hygienically clean, who sleep and play comfortably in plenty of fresh air and who have been properly trained are happy, well-behaved babies. The period of infancy is more important than any later two years of life. The child's nervous system is like a series of telegraph wires carrying impulses through the eyes, ears, fingers and mouth to the brain—each impulse making a deeper habit path for itself than the last.

If these first stimuli are arranged by the mother in good, orderly fashion, there will be no danger of an emotional storm later on.

Baker's Cocoa

is the ideal drink for growing children

Not only does its delicious flavor and aroma appeal to the palate but it supplies the body with a considerable amount of pure, wholesome and nutritious food.

Children, owing to their almost ceaseless activity, frequently require as large an amount of nourishment as adults, and good cocoa is a valuable aid in the carefully arranged diet. But its quality must be good and no cocoa can quite so well meet the requirements of dietitian, physician, nurse or housekeeper as "BAKER'S"

Comfort Sisters' Corner

CARPENTER, R. R. 2, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have often thought of writing but at the last moment my heart would fail me, but I think it was a description of Mrs. Mullikin's flowers that really woke me up and gave me courage. I love flowers and one rarely sees or hears of such a collection as she has. I would enjoy a glimpse of them. I have quite a few.

This is planting time. I wonder how many of the sisters raise their own plants? This is the way I go about it. I procure my soil and bake or heat it in the oven to kill all seeds of a foreign nature and destructive earth worms. Put in a shallow box allowing plenty of room for the young plants and keep the box in the house until the plants come up and every day thereafter I put them out in the sunshine. That makes them hardy. I usually plant the seed about March 15th for early plants and April 7th for late plants.

I also make my own soap. Have tried many ways but think this the best. One can of lye or potash dissolved in one quart of rain water, let come to boil. Add four pounds of grease drippings or scraps and let boil vigorously for a short time, stirring constantly. If scraps are used, as soon as they are eaten up the soap is done. It is solid and good.

I am a sufferer from rheumatism. Can any of the sisters help me? I have doctored for several years but am getting worse.

I hope to see this in print. Good wishes to the whole family. MRS. HATTIE WELLS.

GOLDTHWAITE, P. O. BOX 277, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

At last I have managed to get up sufficient nerve to write to the Sisters' Corner. I have wondered many times if I could write a letter that would be of interest to any one.

I am a great lover of flowers and will tell you how I have my flowers arranged. Our house fronts the west and from the porch to the gate over the walk is an arbor covered with Dorothy Perkins roses of red and pink, and inside the arbor are hanging baskets of ivy and Wandering Jew, and shelves on each side for my pot plants,—the rose vines protect them from the hot sun and high winds.

On the north side of the yard I have a bed built of rock about three feet high and two feet wide, filled with rich soil. I planted a red geranium in the center and the Wandering Jew around the edge, and it is growing on the sides between the rocks; at each end of the front steps is an oleander, pink and white, growing in tubs so they can be put in the pit in the winter.

On the south side I have a large bed of Cannas, bordered with violets, and around a cedar tree is a bed of verbenas, this is also bordered with violets, and morning glory vines running on the tree, and then I have a bed of dahlias and tuberoses in the corner of the house and porch. At the front fence is a row or Shasta daisies, and in a very large bed are a mixture of roses, gladioli, chrysanthemums, marygolds and zinnias.

In the back yard, for a background is a row of hollyhocks, and gladioli, and under the water tank is an elephant ear and a large clump of cattails, at the back porch is a bed of red geraniums, and a porch box of red, white and purple verbenas, and a window box of red, white and pink geraniums, and climbing up the side and over the kitchen door is a morning glory vine.

Next year I plan to have a bed made of rocks, about five feet wide and one foot high, filled with good rich soil and planted in coleus.

There is lots of work about flowers but I enjoy it for a home is not complete without them to me. I have seven children at home, five boys and two girls, from 14 years down to a sweet brown-eyed baby boy six months old. They are all healthy and strong and full of life and you can just imagine the noise they make for they are a merry band.

I take several magazines, some of them $2.00 per year, but I like COMFORT best of all. I hope every COMFORT sister that reads my letter will write to me. I will answer all I can.

With love to all,

COMFORT'S friend,
MRS. ALBERT M. HUNT.

WASHINGTON, INDIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I enjoy reading COMFORT and am always glad when it arrives. The first thing I look for are the pictures and then I read every letter. It's like talking to some old friends.

How many of the sisters, after making pies such as lemon, cocoanut, etc., mark them in the size they are to be cut, as soon as they come from the oven? It keeps the meringue from coming apart and makes a neat looking pie.

NORWOOD EUGENE DAYTON.

I am sending a picture of my little boy who was four years old when this was taken. He has light hair and big brown eyes and very fair. He likes fishing. His name is Norwood Eugene.

I would like to hear from as many sisters as care to write. I like to get letters, especially in the winter time.

I am twenty-five years old, fair complexion, gray eyes, and am five feet and two inches tall, and married to one of the best men in the world.

Love to all. MRS. MELL DAYTON.

PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR SISTERS:

While reading COMFORT today the idea came to me to write again, as I love the paper dearly. In fact, it's the only friend I have.

I noticed in a recent issue of COMFORT something about making coffee of wheat and I'll tell you how we make ours. To one gallon of wheat bran add one pint of cooking molasses and one-half pint of white sugar; mix through the bran so as not to leave any lumps. Put in the baker to brown and stir often so it won't burn. I use two teaspoons of this for one cup of coffee. This is not as good as coffee but we like it better and I cannot drink the real coffee.

I'll tell you why I haven't many friends. It is because I am an unfortunate girl, and most of you know how they are treated. I was scorned and have to live as a servant in my own family. I hope Troubled Mother takes that girl to her heart and loves her as her only daughter. LONESOME.

HERON, MONTANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Is there room for a sister, one who has read your letters and profited by them for several years and who has a warm spot in her heart for all?

Molly Joe, I think you are right. One can be happy and carefree more so when single than when married. I wish you success.

Daisy Whitman, the last paragraph of your letter ought to be a cure for any movie grouch.

Stuffing Blue Chums, I don't blame you for being proud of your letter. It was an inspiration to many of us.

Contented Wife, as to teaching your little girl her letters at home, it seems as though most teachers condemn this as they use the phonetic method now instead of the old letter building idea. Last year I started my boy to school. He had had no teaching of any kind at home. He was past six years old and made the second grade at the end of the term, with a number of good marks to his credit. This year my girl, who wasn't six until November, began her first year in school, but during last spring and summer my boy, being so proud of being able to read, taught her the letters and a number of the phonetics, also a few small words. This year after going two weeks in the first grade she was promoted to the second grade. So I think it doesn't do any harm to teach the letters and some small words, also how to add and count.

Mrs. Alice Montgomery, you certainly are right concerning the Bachelor and Modern girl. I've a bachelor brother with whom I've had many a lengthy argument on this subject. And in the last two years he is beginning to look at the subject the same as I.

Let me tell you how I amuse my children on long winter evenings or rainy days. We make picture frames, by cutting them out of wall paper samples and mounting the pretty pictures we find in magazines and catalogues. We also make our valentines, Easter cards and Christmas decorations this same way. Of course there is no real value in these things but it does teach the children harmony of color and takes up time that otherwise would get on our nerves. For instance, a Bon Ami chicken cut from a colored page, mounted on an oblong piece of wall paper of pretty design and this tied to a piece of blotter the same size and shape, by baby ribbon, and with the words Easter Greeting written in colored ink, makes a very nice gift for a schoolmate or a member of the family.

Valentines are made from wall paper hearts mounted on plain writing paper background and surrounded by small gold or red hearts and a few appropriate words. One can develop dozens of pretty things in a few evenings.

I would like to get the words to an old song, part of which goes:

"The colored folks are scattered o'er the land, and times ain't like they used to be,
When Massa had his say and each plantation had its negro band."

Also the words to the song, "For Grandmother Told Me So," which starts with the words:

"American Eagle, hysterical bird, oh, flap your wings and crow,
For slavery's embellished, yes, dat's the word, for Grandmother told me so."

Love to all.

MRS. DELLA M. BARTO.

ROSEBURG, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I've taken COMFORT for three years and during that time have dropped a number of other magazines that cost more but were not worth as much. I think that tells how I like COMFORT.

I am especially interested in the letters that pertain to home making and child raising. I've been married six years and have two lively children and sometimes they tax my patience and wisdom to the limit. Their names are Theo, Jr., five, and Marie, two. Now I come to my question: I would like to know what the sisters have to say on this subject. When a child does a forbidden thing and owns up to it (which seems to be seldom), what is the best thing to do, punish him for the deed and risk him lying to save himself the next time, or let him go without being punished and maybe do something worse the next time? My boy has surely got the best of me, even though he is only a baby. He doesn't fear or care for anyone. The baby seems to be the same too. They defy you to spank them. It just seems to make matters worse.

Now for a few hints that you may already know, but I didn't always.

Odds and ends of crochet thread are better for working buttonholes than spool cotton, especially the soft finish for outing-flannel nighties, etc.

When making lemon pie filling, after squeezing the juice from the lemons, drop the rinds into the boiling water a few minutes before adding the other ingredients. Remove rinds.

If your frosting should happen to cook too long and sugar, just put some butter in a little hot water and dip a knife in this to smooth it down. This will prevent it getting hard and crumbling.

I am fitting black sateen and blue denim rompers to my little girl for this winter, to save wash and wear of under clothing.

Brownie's Triumph

Isabel's quick eye soon caught sight of them, and with a cry of pleasure she darted across the room to secure them, then returned to the desk and finally succeeded in fitting the right key in its lock.

The desk, in itself was nothing remarkable, for it had seen long usage, but its contents were rare and lovely.

A golden penholder and pen lay within; also an elaborate paper knife of the same metal; a silver paper weight of exquisite workmanship and design; a seal of onyx, in which blazed a huge ruby; besides several other things; and all these were marked with the same initials, "E. H."

Isabel lifted the inner lid, and, behold! the casket of ebony, inlaid with pearl, which Miss Metabel had given Brownie on that last day of her life, was within.

There were also several packages of letters and papers, but to these she paid no heed.

"I have found them," she cried, and was about to seize the casket when she caught the sound of a footstep outside the door.

Her heart stood still with fear, and cold chills crept down her back.

She had not dreamed that Miss Douglas would return so soon, for she had heard her tell Alma she would be gone for an hour or more.

She would not be caught in this contemptible act for all the jewels in the queen's crown, and she began to look about for some way of escape.

A hand was laid upon the doorknob, and it turned. A moment's silence, and it was tried again—this time with more force.

Then a voice called:

"Miss Douglas, please, may I come in a moment?"

It was Viola's; and Isabel grew faint with a sense of relief, but she stood silent, scarcely daring to breathe, lest she should be heard, and her sister insist upon coming in.

Presently she heard Alma call out:

"Viola, Miss Douglas is not there; she has gone out for a walk."

Then the steps moved away, and the guilty girl was obliged to sit down to gather strength, before she could continue her investigations. Cowardice and guilt are inseparable.

She dare not wait long, however, and soon turned her attention to the ebony casket again.

Fortunately for her, the little golden key, with its curious chain attached, was in the lock.

Brownie had forgotten to clasp it about her neck again after replacing the jewels.

As she was about turning the key she hesitated, while a feeling of her own meanness stole over her.

"If I didn't mistrust the girl, I wouldn't do it," she apologized to herself. Then she added: "If she is not what she pretends, of course it is better for us to know it before the girls become contaminated; but if I do not discover anything, why, then it is all right."

With this bit of doubtful sophistry in her mind, she turned the key and lifted the lid.

The sight which greeted her dazzled her, even as it had Brownie when she had first looked upon those treasures.

There lay the coral cross and the butterfly hair ornament, for which she had been seeking, but she almost lost sight of them while gazing upon those others, of tenfold more value and beauty.

"Now I know she is a thief!" murmured the astonished girl, when she had somewhat recovered from her surprise. "It is not possible," she added, "that any girl of her age, outside of royalty itself, could ever be the rightful possessor of such magnificence as this. Why, there is a fortune here," she went on; "and no one need tell me that a girl would choose to work for her daily bread when she has the means of living in luxury in her possession. But no, it is evident that she has stolen them, and does not dare to sell them for fear of detection. Yes, and she must have stolen all those other things marked 'E. H.' What a creature we have been harboring! I imagine Wilbur and Mr. Dredmond will not think her quite so charming when they come to know that her dainty hands have been guilty of kleptomania. How exquisite," she said, bending over them and touching the precious stones with her white fingers. "This diamond necklace is fit for a princess. But what shall I do about them?" she asked, after she had inspected them all. "If she has stolen them, as I do not doubt she has, they certainly ought not to be left in her possession. I will take them to mamma, and ask her what shall be done with them."

With this decision arrived at, Isabel closed the lid of the casket, remarking its beautiful inlaid cover as she did so; then, removing it from the desk, she shut and locked that, and restored the keys to the trunk where she had found them. Then she sped swiftly to her mother's boudoir, devoutly hoping that Brownie would not return until she had displayed her treasures to her, made her explanation, and they could decide what was best to be done about the matter.

If the truth had been known, the meddlesome girl had a secret longing to possess the jewels herself.

CHAPTER XV.

TERRIBLE ACCUSATION.

Mrs. Coolidge looked up with a frown as Isabel entered the room.

"What have you there?" she demanded, as she caught sight of the casket which her daughter carried.

"You remember, mamma, what I said about Miss Douglas being the possessor of such elegant jewels?" said Isabel, not heeding the question.

"Yes; you said you did not quite believe she came by them honestly. Why?"

"I am sure of it now. Look here!"

She suddenly threw back the lid of the casket, and placed it in her mother's lap.

"Merciful heavens, child! Where did you get these? Ah!" she continued, as Isabel did not reply, "here are the very ornaments which Miss Douglas wore the other evening."

She looked up at her daughter, and the two read each other's faces in silence for a moment.

"You do not mean to tell me that you found all these in her possession?" she said at length in a low tone.

"I do, mamma," Isabel said impressively.

"But how did you happen to discover them? Surely, my daughter, you have not been guilty of prying into her things during her absence," said Mrs. Coolidge gravely.

Isabel colored violently.

"I have, mamma. I should think it was time some one investigated matters, when we have a governess in the house possessing such treasures. I believed her guilty of theft, and I was determined that the girls should not remain under her influence if anything could be proved against her. So I set myself to work; and I think when you have examined the contents of that box, and hear what I have to tell you, that you will conclude that she is no fit instructress for your daughters."

"Isabel, I am afraid you have done a very unwise thing," remarked her mother thoughfully, with her eyes still fixed upon the jewels.

"How so?"

"We cannot prove that she stole a single article in her possession."

"Why, she has quantities of beautiful things, marked with the initials 'E. H.'"

And Isabel explained about the case of golden-stoppered perfumery flasks, and the contents of the writing-desk; also about the note.

"If she is light-fingered, you don't want her here; she'll be adding to her stock by appropriating our treasures," concluded the heartless girl.

"No; if she is that kind of a person, she ought not to be allowed to remain."

"Well, do you believe that any girl in her circumstances could be the honest possessor of that fortune?" Isabel asked, pointing toward the gleaming jewels.

"No, I'm afraid not. Yet I dislike, of all things, that you should have got them in the way you have."

Mrs. Coolidge took up the diamond necklace, and it sparkled in her hands like huge drops of dew in the sun.

"Very well; I will replace them at once, mamma, if you think best and we will say no more about it," replied her daughter cunningly.

She had noticed the avaricious gleam in her mother's eyes as they contemplated their beauty, and she knew she would give as much to possess them as she would herself.

"That would never do, my daughter. I should not rest easy while there is a suspicion against Miss Douglas's honesty in my heart. There is only one thing to be done now."

"What is that?"

"We must demand an explanation of her immediately upon her return."

"Of course, she has a trumped-up story of some kind; she is too artful not to be prepared for us."

"She will have to prove her property, my dear. At all events, I shall advise her to dispose of them in some way. It is not proper for a governess to have such valuables."

"Perhaps she would sell them to us, mamma," said Isabel, a greedy look in her eyes. "That tiara would be vastly becoming to me."

"They are the most exquisite jewels I have ever seen in my life, and the settings are peculiar. But what is there underneath? Have you looked, Isabel?" Mrs. Coolidge asked, finding the velvet bed was movable.

"No; I was so startled at finding such an array that I did not stop to make any further investigations, but brought them directly to you."

Mrs. Coolidge lifted the velvet bed.

"What have we here?" she exclaimed, as she saw the enameled locket studded with diamonds.

With breathless curiosity she touched the spring, and it flew open, revealing the face of Lord Dunforth.

"Who can it be, mamma?" asked Isabel, with wonder-wide eyes.

"I do not know; no one who belongs to Miss Douglas, I fancy, from his looks. How strangely he is dressed—like some court gentleman."

"And what is this?" said Isabel, taking up the card that lay beneath. Then she cried out: "Why, mamma, it is a dancing list, and look! here are the names of counts and lords! Do you believe now that Miss Douglas ever came by these things honestly?" she demanded, in tones of triumph.

"No, Isabel, I do not," returned her mother, with firm-set lips; "and I shall inquire into it immediately on her return."

"What could a young girl eighteen years old—a poor working girl without a penny, too, and who had never been out of her own country before, know of lords and counts?"

The idea was absurd.

There was a mystery about the whole thing, a tantalizing mystery, which both women were eager to solve.

Evidently Miss Douglas had seen better days, they reasoned, or she could never have received the excellent education she possessed; but then any enterprising person in moderate circumstances could acquire that under the training of the first-class schools which are found in most of the larger cities of the United States.

While these thoughts were passing through the mind of Mrs. Coolidge, she heard the hall door open and close, and Brownie's voice in cheerful conversation with Wilbur.

He had joined her by accident (?) while she was walking, and had made himself so entertaining and agreeable that the clouds upon her face had all been driven away.

She tripped gayly up stairs, wholly unconscious of the thunderbolt awaiting her.

Isabel confronted her as she reached the top stairs.

"Mamma would like to see you in her dressing-room immediately, Miss Douglas," she said haughtily.

She colored at the tone and manner, but, wholly unconscious of any coming evil, she obeyed the summons as soon as she had removed her hat and jacket.

She found Mrs. Coolidge sitting cold and dignified in her armchair.

"Be seated, Miss Douglas," she said solemnly. "I wish to speak to you upon a matter of importance."

Brownie sat down, her clear eyes wide with wonder at her reception.

There was a moment's awkward silence, the lady of the house hardly knowing how to commence.

"Ahem!" she began, shifting her glance from the clear, innocent eyes, which she had thought must have fallen before her accusing look. "Ahem! Miss Douglas, I have sent for you to ask what may seem a strange question, nevertheless, I feel it to be a duty to myself and family to ask it."

Brownie's fair face began to change color again.

Mrs. Coolidge noticed it, and her assurance was restored.

"I, of course, expect you to give me a straightforward reply," she added impressively.

The shining brown head was lifted a trifle, her delicate nostrils dilated, while an unwonted spark lighted those beautiful eyes, which never for a moment left the matron's face.

She requested to give a straightforward answer!

When had she ever done otherwise?

"I wish to ask you, Miss Douglas," Mrs. Coolidge said, coming to the point at once, and feeling very uncomfortable beneath her look, "if you have anything in your possession which does not honestly belong to you?"

She now fixed her stern gaze full upon the beautiful face. The battle was begun, and she was prepared to fight it out.

For an instant all three—for Isabel had returned to the room, and now stood behind her mother's chair, where she could watch her rival—could distinctly hear the ticking of Mrs. Coolidge's watch, which lay upon the dressing table at her side.

Then Brownie arose, and stood like an insulted princess before her inquisitor.

"Madam, I ask—nay, I demand—to know why you put such a question to me?" she said, in low, firm tones.

Her face had grown white as the narrow linen collar which she wore, and her eyes burned dangerously.

"You forget yourself, Miss Douglas," Mrs. Coolidge said pompously. "It was I who asked you a question."

"And I consider such a question an insult, madam!"

"Very well; I expected you would; all people who are guilty of wrong feel insulted, or appear to, when they are accused."

"Guilty of wrong! accused! I do not understand you, madam. Of what do you acense me?" demanded the young girl, with a proud dignity which her employer had not expected from her.

She began to feel a little shaky, but she was in for it now, and must go on.

"I accuse you of having stolen costly articles and appropriating them to your own use," she said solemnly.

"Explain yourself, if you please, Mrs. Coolidge."

Those brown eyes were almost black now, but her answer was intensely quiet, and the lovely face like a snowflake.

"Allow me to ask you one question before I explain."

"Certainly."

"How came you by those beautiful jewels, those very costly ornaments, which you wore to the opera last Wednesday evening?"

"They were given to me, madam."

"By whom?"

"By a very dear friend."

There was a quiver in the sweet voice, a trembling of the scarlet lips, but the lovely eyes were bright and tearless.

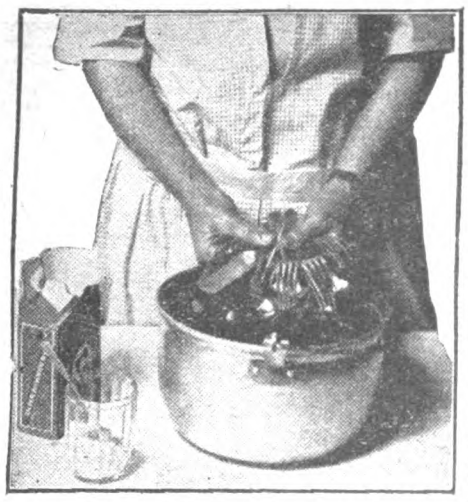
Short Cuts in Housekeeping

By Clara Huntington

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

TO CLEAN TARNISHED SILVER with a minimum amount of labor, make a solution of one teaspoon of cooking soda and one teaspoon of salt to each quart of water in an aluminum kettle. Bring to a boil, lay in the silver and boil until the tarnish disappears. The solution must cover the silver. Plunge silver into a pan of clean boiling hot water and let it stand until cool enough to wash the silver, then rinse in a second pan of hot water.

A TWINE BOX is a kitchen convenience and a very practical one can be made from a small-sized corn syrup can. Punch a hole in the center of cover, then pound flat the turned back sharp edges. Place the ball in the can, bring the end through the cover and then press it firmly into the box. Decorate it and you have a pretty gift that any housekeeper would appreciate.



MAKE RUBBER BANDS.

RUBBER BANDS cut from old inner tubes of automobiles are handy things around the house. For very elastic ones, cut off narrow strips, but where stronger ones are required cut wider. Hold flat and cut through both sides at once.

IN IRONING WOOL OR SILK, great care should be taken that the iron be not too hot. An iron that is not hot enough to burn may yellow these two fabrics. When a starched garment is yellowed it will usually wash out, as the starch has protected the material.

WASH CHAMOIS SKINS in lukewarm water and a mild hard soap. Rinse in water of the same temperature to which a little soap has been added.

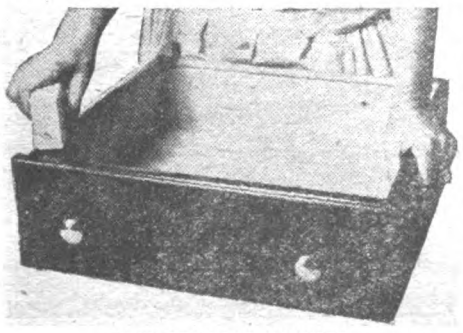
CANNED MILK can be used from the tin. Make two small holes in the top, one on each side. One hole is to pour through and the other acts as a vent. Shake the milk into the holes and enough will adhere to dry and form a seal. When needed again, break the seal with a toothpick.

TO CLEAN TARNISHED SILVER.

STRENGTHEN BUTTONHOLES on children's clothes by stitching around the holes before the garments are worn. Make several parallel rows.

DRY COCOANUT becomes tasteless if kept too long, but it may be restored by placing in a clean cloth and steamed until it has softened.

NEW IRON GEM-PANS should be washed and greased and placed in a very moderate oven for one hour before they are used. By doing this they will never rust or stick.



THE PATIENT IN BED finds that wholesome dish, egg-on-toast, very difficult to handle. To avoid this, butter, the toast, cut in small pieces, moisten and then lay on the poached egg.

PEEL ONIONS while holding them under cold water and the fumes will not reach the eyes and cause them to smart.

BEFORE USING YOUR NEW OILCLOTH TABLE COVER, place it on the table wrong side up, and with a pencil mark where the corners and edges will come, then glue over the pencil marks two-inch wide strips of muslin with thin glue. The muslin will take the wear caused by sharp edges and thus save the surface from breaking.

WASHING HANDKERCHIEFS that have been used at the time of heavy colds in the head is often an unpleasant task, but the labor can be lessened by putting the handkerchiefs in a pail of cold water to which one cup of salt has been added, and letting them soak some hours. Without putting the hands into them, work around with the clothes-stick, drain, put through a tepid water, drain and wash as usual.

SHIPPING HATS SAFELY presents quite a problem unless one understands how it is done. Use a heavy corrugated box, or use a pasteboard box and crate it with laths. Sew the hats firmly to the box, and unless large enough to fill the box, another hat can be sewed to the center of the cover.

GREASE SPOTS are removed from wall-paper by holding a piece of blotting-paper over them and applying a hot iron. Repeat until all traces disappear.

A WINDOW SHADE with regulation spring roller is an excellent arrangement in front of open shelves.

SAVE UNCOOKED MUTTON SCRAPS, render and keep the tallow near the kitchen sink. After cleaning or washing dishes, dip the fingers into the tallow while still damp and rub well, especially around the finger nails. It prevents roughness of the skin and the cuticle around the nails from hardening.

TO KEEP BUTTER COOL in hot weather, set the dish or crock in cold water to which a generous amount of saltpeter has been added. Now cover the dish with a wet cloth, allowing the corners to rest in the saltpeter water.

IN HANGING OUT CLOTHES in cold weather much exposure can be avoided by pinning handkerchiefs and all other small things to large towels before they are taken out of doors. This is also a good plan at any season of the year where pinning to the line may injure delicate fabrics.

WHITENING STRAW HATS.

TACK A LEATHER STRAP to the inside of a pantry door to hold sharp knives. Space the sections with two tacks, one above the other, and have each section sized so it will fit a particular knife.

GLUE PIECES OF FELT or other very firm thick material to the heels of rubbers or overshoes as a safeguard against slipping.

SAVING SALT after making ice cream is easily done by pouring ice, water and salt into a coarse burlap bag and hanging it in the open to drain and dry. As salt kills vegetation, care should be taken where the bag is hung.

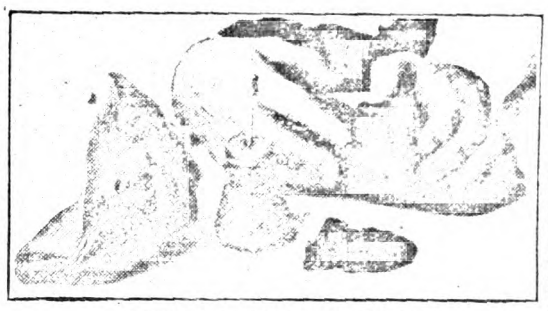
HOT PARAFFIN applied to breaks in the plastering will prevent crumbling until it can be repaired.

IF HOT WATER IS SCARCE and there are greasy dishes to wash, dissolve a little crystal washing soda in what you have and it will wash more dishes. Rinse in cold water.

CLEAN WINDOW SHADES with a coarse white flannel dipped in powdered chalk or flour while holding them flat and smooth on a table.

GARTER CLASPS make excellent loops by which to hang utility bags. They are also useful to hang holders by, and to sew to the edge of sheets used to hang over clothing.

SLIP IT OFF A TIGHT COVER.



WATER FOR THE FIELD will keep cool if kept in a stone jug, covered with a wet jacket and hung where it will catch the breezes. Make the jacket of heavy knit underwear to fit the jug. Tie the bottom opening securely as the weight of jug and water rests upon it. Tie the top as securely and hang by the string, or a run may be made and a heavy cord drawn in for convenience in opening. As the jacket dries it is again wet.

AFTER REMOVING THE GLUE BOTTLE CORK, replace it with a piece of candle which prevents sticking and the glue from drying.

MEASURING BUTTER so none is wasted by adhering to the sides of cup is done in this way: If a half cup is desired, fill the cup half full of water, then put in pieces of butter until the cup is even full.

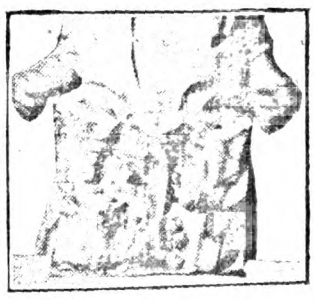
PIECES OF WHITE OILCLOTH laid on the cooking shelf or table to receive forks and spoons that are in use while cooking save much after cleaning.

BLACK STOVE ENAMEL applied to the sides of stove, including doors, will greatly reduce the labor of cleaning and blacking. The stove must be cold, then all the grease and dust removed with gasolene before applying the enamel. Automobile enamel can be used with success. Greasy dish water if used twice a day will keep the top in good condition.

TO PREVENT SLIPPING IN WINTER.

KEEP SEVERAL SPRING CLOTHES-PINS in the bedrooms to hold the curtains out of the open windows at night. Make an even drape and fasten to upper half of curtain.

TO WHITEN AND CLEAN A STRAW or Panama hat, make a paste of sulphur and lemon juice, rub it thoroughly onto the straw with an old toothbrush and allow it to dry several hours. Brush off the dry paste with a clean stiff brush.



FELT PADS ON CHAIR LEGS or any part of furniture that rests on the floor is a great saving of scratches and noise; besides, furniture so protected can be easily moved about. Cut piece of felt to fit, spread with glue, also the place to be covered, and press the pad in place. The weight of furniture makes it very firm. Use pieces of old felt hat.

TO REMOVE A GLASS STOPPER that is tight in the bottle, wet a cloth in boiling water and wrap it about the neck of bottle. In a short time the stopper is easily removed.

CORNERS CHIPPED FROM GILT FRAMES can be built in with putty and treated with gold paint.

TIGHT PAIL COVERS that fit on the outside are often removed at the price of broken finger nails. To overcome the difficulty tie a strong string around the pail just under the cover. Slip a skewer through the knot and twist the cord until it is tight enough to lift the cover with an upward motion.

CARBOLIZED MUTTON TALLOW is excellent for the hands and feet. Cut mutton suet into fine bits, put into a bowl and set in a dish of boiling water. Place in the oven to render. To one cup of the strained warm tallow add scant half teaspoon of carbolic acid, and beat as it cools. Keep in a covered glass jar, or in a vaseline bottle. As carbolic acid is dangerous to have about, put several pins into the cork as a reminder of the contents of bottle, and mark "Poison."

GARTER CLASPS FOR LOOPS.

SOFTEN BUTTER by setting a granite bowl in the oven until hot and then turning it over the butter.

BRIGHTEN ALUMINUM dishes by rubbing with a cloth dipped in lemon juice.

WHEN CARRYING A LAMP, turn the wick down as the motion produces a current of air, causing the flame to smoke.

IN LAYING LINOLEUM, an allowance of half an inch should be made on all four sides if the room is fairly large, as it will stretch that much. After having been in place a few weeks, if the carpet begins to bulge anywhere, examine the edges and you will find they are pressing against the wall and should be trimmed, otherwise the linoleum will crack.

PEEL ONIONS UNDER WATER.

RUST SPOTS ON NICKEL are much improved by covering several coats of softened mutton fat and letting it remain several days. Next apply rotten-stone and oil and rub vigorously. Finish with whiting and oil.

OPEN TIN CANS with pliers when the key is lost. Grasp the tiny tin lip with the pliers and roll back the opening strip of tin in the same way the key is used. Handy trick for campers.

WINDOW ENVELOPES are useful. Cut out the "window" and with clean mucilage paste a strip of it over a torn school book, torn sheet music or other printing. Draw the edges carefully together and the tear is nearly concealed.

A CLOTH-COVERED TABLE TOP can be made washable as follows: Use a good quality of white drilling and shrink it. Tack the lengthwise edge to one side of the table after tearing off the selvage, turning it well under. The tacks should be about three-fourths inch apart. Now draw the cloth to the opposite side of table, tack to place and then do the two ends. The cloth must be perfectly smooth and not twisted. Give several coats of white paint and finish with a coat of enamel. Dry well between coats.

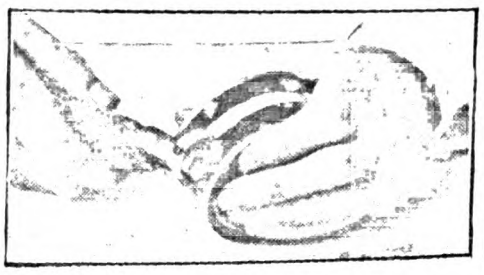
EASE STICKING DRAWERS by rubbing with hard soap that part which comes in contact with any part of the case. Slightly warmed beeswax is used in the same way.

AN ODD PIECE OF INLAID LINOLEUM makes an excellent table covering for children to play and study on. Waterproof cement or a good quality of glue holds the linoleum to the table. Let dry several days, then with a sharp knife trim even with edge of table.

A HANDFUL OF ASHES put into a bottle, then half filled with cold water and shaken will usually remove all stains.



HOW TO SHIP HATS.

OLD FASHIONED CLOTHES-PINS make handy pegs to hang clothing or other articles on. Bore holes with a bit, regulating the size to fit ends of clothes-pins. Do not make the holes too large. As the pins are driven in the spring of the two ends will hold them in place.

HOT COMPRESSES for the sick can be kept in readiness and easily handled by wringing them out in comfortably hot water, then folded to the desired size and laid in a steamer over a kettle of boiling water.

ADDRESSES ARE LOST at times by the wrapping around a package becoming worn. This frequently occurs with foreign mail, so it is well to use three separate wrappings, tying and addressing each one with care.

WOODEN BUCKETS and washtubs should have several inches of clean water left in them when not in use. It is a protection against shrinkage which causes leaks.

OPENING WITH PLIERS.

DARN THE FELT on embroidery hoops with padding cotton when the hoops no longer hold the work firmly.

LIME-WATER is readily made as follows: Into a clean pitcher put two cups of quicklime and cover it about six inches with soft drinking water. Stir occasionally for about an hour with an agate spoon, then let it settle for a good part of a day. Carefully pour off the water, strain through wet white cloth and bottle. Lime-water is excellent for keeping nursing bottles sweet and for other purposes.

WHEN SENDING FOOD to a sick friend try to use paper plates and napkins, or other receptacles that need not be returned, and have it so understood. Such thoughtfulness will be appreciated for steps count where there is sickness.

TO COOL AN OVEN QUICKLY, place a pan of cold water on the bottom of oven. As it cools so rapidly, care must be taken that it does not become too cool.

A DUSTLESS DUSTER is made by soaking cheesecloth in a strong hot suds to which a little turpentine has been added.

CORK STOPPERS will often develop an unpleasant odor which can usually be removed by soaking them in a cup of hot water to which a spoon of cooking soda has been added.

TO IRON CENTERPIECE, stretch and warp, then with the woof, of course, in the same way. The result will be a smooth, round surface. To try to iron causes puckers.

REMOVE GREASE FROM SOUP by laying glazed paper over the top. The paper will remain long enough to tear when used, if necessary.

WASH EGG BEATERS by holding them part in the water. If the whole beater is wet, the beater will throw black when it is used.

TO MEND WIRE SCREENING that has cut out a square that includes the hole around the hole. Cut a piece of screening inch larger than the hole, lay it over the hole and fasten by "sewing" both the edges of the edge of screen with a raveling of the screen with a "whipping" stitch. Two people can do the work, one pulling the wire through and directed from the opposite side.

A RUBBER BOOT WET ON THE INSIDE is hard to dry out, but the following method will greatly facilitate drying and prevent the accumulation of dampness often found in rubber footwear. Cut a piece of cotton cloth that, when sewed together, will fit the inside leg of a rubber boot and prevent it from sticking. This allows a free circulation of air and should be slipped into the boots as soon as they are taken off.

RUBBER HEELS prevent a certain fatigue to one who stands most of the time, but if commercial rubber heels cannot be obtained, or if shoes are too old to repay the outlay, the worn-down lifts can be removed and replaced with lifts cut from old rubbers. They are held in place with rubber cement.

WHEN CREAM IS TOO THIN for whipping add unbeaten egg white before beginning to beat.

ELECTRIC TAPE is useful around the house. It will mend school books, seal holes in fruit jars, cover a hole in a pane of glass until it can be replaced, cover a hot water bottle, cover small cuts, take the place of rubbers, besides many other uses that will be found if it is at hand.

KITCHEN SCISSORS are useful to cut bacon rind from slices of breakfast bacon, shred cabbage, cutting cubes of celery, cutting the meat from cooked meat, cutting up raisins, trimming the membrane from sections of oranges and grapefruit and for removing the eyes of pineapple.

IN THREADING A NEEDLE pass the end of the thread through the eye and then double the thread about two inches from the end and run the needle through it and pull the thread through. This is an improvement over the old way.

FOUR LARGE DINNER NAPKINS can be made into a pretty table-cover for a bedroom bureau by adding a narrow crochet and then crocheting in the corners a scallop to match.

GRIMY BEESWAX may be cleaned by melting into boiling water. As it melts it will settle to the bottom of dish. When cool remove cake, warm and reshape.

afternoon I was on the Rive Gauche in market. A handsome young trooper of ign Legion, ready to depart that night to is regiment in Africa, was drinking with sweetheart in a wine shop over there. 't help being amused at the naive love- of these two children and at the clever of the young trooper. The old woman the place was trying to use their case to moral or adorn a tale, I can't say which. watched them holding hands she cackled hat's right; love and drink while you are due vin et des dames sont pour la jeunesse; time will come when you will be old and d when your little loved one there will be toothless and asthmatic.' The old wo- s a living illustration of her own text. In uth were a few blackened tusks; her face e color of cobweb, great tufts of beard om the warts upon her chin. But the ellow came back: 'If my lady shall live thousand years old, she will never attain ugly as thou art, old Nutcrackers.'
this comeback the girl laughed a little her cakes and wine. She was a French of the rarest type. Her skin was white rly pink and her hair was what I should es-of-gold. The ancient dame showed no ent at the trooper's parry but kept on: oiselle, do you see the old woman across yonder selling filberts? She was once le of the Latin Quarter, and of the Right oo; savants and generals have eaten at le; now she sells filberts to keep her out grave. Listen to her. She is cursing the who steal her filberts.

'How e a pessimistic old she-baboon!" he shouted 'Me, I will always love my little Diane, little goddess shall grow older, why, so ill I. Our love shall be like the good Bur- wine that grows mellower with age. Now ve never thought on the grape, have you, terackers? You see nothing beautiful. But er the grape. In spring it is green and ith many soft tendrils like a young girl's n early summer come the clusters of bloom he golden bees droning everywhere about then in autumn hang the great bunches of fruit ready for the wine-presses.'
t in winter? In winter?' shouted the old n. 'Then crouch the naked crooked vines he skeletons and lift their bony fingers in to heaven as they shiver in the wind!'
here now, old she-singe,' the soldier an- d quick enough, 'it is only the body of the hat shivers. Its soul is making merry in hall where roystering Christmas cheer is in r. See, the soul of the grape is in the bou- of this wine. Shall I call it forth!" and he ed the cork from a bottle of champagne and d a glass for his little sweetheart.
t the old woman was by no means con- d. She began the argument from a new : 'The devil will make a play for you two, r it will be the wolf, the wolf, that snarls sets poor people by the ears; or else old will come in another form! Alors, Rene goes to Algiers; the devil is there; he knows to do to soldier men! Or else he will come u, mademoiselle, perhaps in the guise of some foreigner. He will steal away your heart Rene Jean and cast you at last upon the vards.'
t this the girl crossed herself, and Rene Jean : 'Come away, little one." We will eat and where the bread and wine are not made bit- y a toothless old she-wolf like this one!"
hat was the last I ever expected to see of e two, but in this I was mistaken. About a th after that there was a big fire at a pottery t here in the city, and a dozen girl operatives brought out to the Neuilly Hospital where I was working. Among the girls I recognized this Diane."

"Ah."

"But I don't know how I recognized her—by her eyes and hair, perhaps. She had escaped the flames but had been caught by falling glass, and her face was dechiffre, out of any likeness to a human countenance. Her cheeks, nose and forehead had been plowed—spun, as an inquisitor might devise to spin out human flesh. She suffered horribly. But her one thought was that she would never again be beautiful in the eyes of Rene Jean. In her delirium she kept repeating the words of old Nutcrackers, as Rene Jean had called the old woman, and saying that the devil had at last got in his work.

"While she was slowly recovering from the shock and the wounds she received a letter from Rene Jean stating that he had got a 'leave of absence wound' and would soon be back in Paris. His eyes were 'affected', the letter said, but they would soon be all right. Up to that time Diane had told him nothing of her own accident. She now wrote him about it but was careful to minimize everything. It was then that the Sister of Mercy who waited on her decided that when the bandages were removed, she must wear, for a time at least, either a veil or a mask or both whenever she went in the street."

"Ah!"

Fernald thought: "It must be she he is describing—but, no, her hair is brown, not ashes-of-gold!" He waited breathlessly for the rest of the story.

"Then one day she got a pneumatique: Rene Jean was in the city and would come out and visit her that afternoon. The sister dressed her in her best and adjusted the mask carefully before she permitted her to look into a mirror. Her lips and eyes were satisfactory——"

"Ah!"

"But her hair had faded out completely white——"

"Ah, then it was not she——"

"She wanted to take off the mask and see herself as she was, but the sister forbade it. And at that moment a taxi drew up before the entrance and stopped with a roar of the motor. The poor child was beside herself and cried out: 'It is he! It is he! Dr. Petit, help me to explain to him why I am wearing this covering!'

"While she spoke, a poor blind ballad peddler across the street began to sing in a clear, heart-touching tenor:

"'Je perdu mes yeux, je passerai ma vie
Dans une obscurite;
Mais j'ai encore une vision
De la gloire et de la beaute.

"'I have lost my sight, I shall pass my life
In darkness as of the night;
But still in my soul is a vision
Of glory and beauty and light.'

"Fernald, I have to admit that, without knowing why, I found my eyes flooded with tears. I never had such a Judgment Day feeling in all my life. I heard a slow step coming up the hallway, and a tap-tapping seemed to run on before it like a guide. 'That is not Rene Jean,' Diane said; 'it is not his walk. It must be that ballad peddler wanting a penny.' The nurse opened the door and someone outside spoke. It was he.

"'Rene Jean?'

"'Yes, my little Diane, I am here!'

"Then Diane saw and covered her eyes. Rene Jean was blind."

"Ah."

"Fernald, I listened to those two children commiserating each other till I could stand it no longer: 'I will be eyes and feet for you, Rene Jean—yes, and hands, too.' And he: 'How happy I am, for now you can never grow old—for me, you will always be young and beautiful.' It was at this point that I bolted from the room. Fernald, did you ever read that poem, by Keats, I think, about a pair of lovers painted on a vase? There's one stanza that rings in my ears even now every time I think of those two. It ends:

"'Yet do not grieve,
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss;
Forever wilt thou love and she be fair.'"

"But those two, where are they now?" cried Fernald.

"They left Paris two years ago and went south, to Italy, I think, on account of Rene Jean's health."

"This Rene Jean, does he play the violin?"

"Yes."

Fernald felt the room swimming round him. "She dyed her hair brown," was his only coherent thought.

A maid entered. "A lady waiting to see you, Dr. Petit."

"I have no appointment at this hour."

"No, but I thought perhaps you might be willing to see her, it is the lady that wears the mask."

Fernald's eyes rolled in his head. Dr. Petit jabbed a hypodermic into his arm and pushed home the piston.

"Show the lady in," he said suavely to the maid.

Harry Fernald heard a roaring in his head and saw a great light; the doctor's voice seemed muffled or far away. He was standing in a cloister, and sweet organ music rolled and died away and rolled again in the space about him.

"Monsieur Fernald, this is Madame Diane Dupuey."

"Monsieur Fernald, I am glad we have met again. It is fortunate that I found you here, Dr. Petit, you will understand why I say this and also why I have come when I explain to Monsieur Fernald. Monsieur Fernald, my husband had to go south for the winter months; he could not breathe the air of Paris. I thought of coming to you, Dr. Petit; but you had helped us out so often, and I really felt that I was earning the money I got from Monsieur Fernald. You will understand, Dr. Petit; we returned here eight weeks ago, in great poverty. Except for a few street clothes I had nothing. Madame Duchemin, who runs the Cafe d'Alsace, was kind to us and agreed to board and lodge us and give us a few franc for medicine for Rene Jean if we two would do all we could to advertise her cafe. Rene Jean played there every night. Ordinary table-luring I could not endure the thought of; so I undertook, it seems, a still more dangerous form of decoying. I went out of afternoons and sketched little pictures with arrows beneath them pointing to la Rue de la Gaite and to the Cafe d'Alsace. Mostly after that I put on my old clothes and took off my mask and waited tables. I had tried at first waiting tables all masked and trigged out; but—you know Paris—it wouldn't work. Often, however, pretending to be a mere visitor to the place, I had dinner with the men I had lured there. It was in this manner that I first got acquainted with Monsieur Fernald. I have done wrong, but I was desperate, Dr. Petit, I came here today to borrow two thousand francs from you. I need it to pay Mr. Fernald what I owe him. I ought to have come——"

Suddenly the organ music ceased and the cloister faded. The cave man in Harry Fernald stood up for a moment demanding payment in kind, love for love, suffering for suffering. "Madame Rose," he cried, "please tell me that this is not true, that it is a hoax! How do I know all this is not a clever story—that you and Dr. Petit here have not framed up on me to get rid of me?"

Dr. Petit saw the situation, diagnosed the case, and took the method of the surgeon: "Madame Dupuey, please remove your mask for Monsieur Fernald."

"No, no, it is not necessary!" Fernald had now passed the cloister and was in a dim holy of holies looking upon a miracle. "And she must not pay back the money I let her have!"

But Dr. Petit was wise in his generation and knew that for the boy's sake the knife was best.

"Yes, she will pay it back," he said. "Go ahead, madame, and take off your mask for Monsieur Fernald."

And the lady, after a moment's hesitation, obeyed.

Brownie's Triumph

"How long have they been in your possession?" continued Mrs. Coolidge.

"A little over three months, madam."

"Mamma, mamma, does not that prove enough?" burst out Isabel triumphantly. "Why, she has been with us over two months, and she worked in the factory three weeks. Who would give a poor girl such jewels as those?"

Brownie's only reply to this outburst was a look of ineffable scorn, and the elder lady went on in a severe tone:

"I fear, Miss Douglas, that your story is against you. When you sought employment from my husband you were in such circumstances that you were obliged to toil for your daily bread."

A proud inclination of her head was all the reply to this query. She dare not trust her voice just then.

"And you say these jewels were given to you about that time?"

Another bow.

"The rich clothing, and other trifles which you have, were they given to you also?"

"Yes, madam!"

"And all by this same dear friend?"

A peculiar look accompanied this question, while Isabel's eyes gleamed in wicked triumph.

She could see whither these questions were tending, if innocent Brownie did not.

"They were," she said.

"Was this friend a gentleman, Miss Douglas?"

For one moment there came into the young girl's lovely eyes a look of perplexity and astonishment, followed by one of blank horror.

Then all the royal blood in her Douglas veins sprang to arms!

The rich color surged up from her enraged heart over her neck and face; up, up, as the full force of this horrible thought nearly drove her mad, until it lost itself among the bands of shining hair, and tingled to her finger-tips. Then it all receded, leaving her colorless as marble, and, in her proud indignation, like some avenging spirit.

"Mrs. Coolidge," she said, in the same quiet, ladylike tones, but they made the woman shiver notwithstanding, "your language and insinuation is the grossest insult to me, and again I demand an immediate explanation."

"Isabel, bring me that box," said Mrs. Coolidge, pointing to Brownie's casket, which stood upon the table behind her.

Miss Coolidge obeyed, and Brownie uttered a cry of astonishment as she saw it.

"How came you by that? Where did you get it?" she said, starting forward, her lips quivering, and a choking sensation in her throat.

Her dear, precious casket, still sacred from the last fond touches of Miss Mehetabel's hand, profaned by their ruthless handling!

But all this emotion was but an evidence of guilt in the eyes of those hard-hearted women.

"Is not that guilt, mamma, if you ever saw it?" whispered Isabel in her mother's ear.

She nodded her head sternly, and then turned to face her victim again.

"I will explain, Miss Douglas. The jewels which you wore to the opera are in this box with others of much greater value. Were these others given to you?"

"They were."

"At the same time?"

"At the same time, Mrs. Coolidge."

"By whom?"

"I decline to answer that question, madam," came defiantly from the young girl's compressed lips.

She had been insulted, abused; she would bear nothing more from them.

They—these evil-minded, jealous women—had gone to her room like thieves and hunted among her possessions to satisfy their low-born curiosity, and having found something which they could not clearly understand, they were determined to make use of it to crush her.

Mrs. Coolidge could scarcely restrain her anger at Brownie's defiance. She was very curious to know the history of those jewels, that attractive picture, and that dancing card with its high-sounding names.

"Am I to understand that you refuse to clear yourself from the suspicion that rests upon you?" she asked, growing white with anger.

"Madam, I question your right to arraign me before you in this manner, as I also question your right to enter my room in my absence, pry into my affairs, and abstract from under lock and key things which belong to me."

"Whose picture is this?" demanded Mrs. Coolidge, taking up the jeweled locket and looking again upon that noble face.

She ignored entirely Brownie's indignant protest, although she colored deeply, for she knew that if Miss Douglas owned that box with its contents she and Isabel were the thieves.

"I decline answering," said Brownie firmly.

She could hardly refrain from crying out with pain to see those sacred relics of a lost love and a shattered life thus profaned by their rude handling.

Beware, Miss Douglas; this defiance goes against you, and I fear will be your ruin if you persist in it," said the woman majestically; then she added, feeling that she needed to make some explanation: "You see that it is something very unusual for a poor person like you to have such rich apparel and jewelry in her possession. We invite you to go to the opera. We do not wish you to wear black, and ask you to wear some other color. You appear more elegantly clad than any member of my family, and you tell Viola that it is the simplest dress you have. Now, what are we to think? Would not any mother having daughters desire to investigate the matter? You say these things were all given to you at the same time and by the same person, and only three months ago? Can you not see how very improbable such a statement appears, when we know that you have been toiling for your daily bread nearly the whole of that time? It would have taken a small fortune," she went on, after an impressive pause, "from any one, to buy all these precious stones at one time, and young girls like you are not in the habit of receiving so much at once. Why, Isabel thinks herself fortunate to get one piece of diamond jewelry at a time. Besides all this, I find here a card with the names of counts and lords upon it. We do not have counts and lords in America; you have never been abroad before, consequently I know you have never had any acquaintance with persons of such high degree. Here is also a glove marked six and a half—I happen to know that you wear a six."

This was said with a frowning look at the little white hands, which were folded in a clasp of pain, and hanging against the folds of her sable dress.

"You refuse also to give me the name of the young man in the locket. Now, I can account for all this in two ways only."

Mrs. Coolidge, as she made this statement, bent her stern gaze upon the pale face and downcast eyes of the haughty girl before her, and thought she could see guilt in every feature. She thought she had very cleverly argued the matter, and paused a moment, well satisfied with herself, before clinching her point.

"And those are," she continued, in a hard, unfeeling voice, "you have either stolen them from some wealthy families with whom you have served, or——"

"Madam!"

The downcast eyes were raised now, and the fire which flashed from them seemed almost to sear the heartless woman's face.

"I dare say, mamma, she was waiting-maid in some rich family, and came by them in that way," put in Isabel spitefully.

"Do not interrupt me, Isabel. Miss Douglas, please wait until I finish before you make any remarks," Mrs. Coolidge said coldly, with a wave of her hand; then continued: "As I was saying, I think you either stole them, or you have had relations with some person which would debar you from ever entering any respectable family, though I cannot conceive how any one could be such a fool as to lavish so much upon a——"

"Cease!" came in a hoarse whisper from Brownie's lovely lips, which had grown the color of ashes, and were quivering with insulted pride and anger, while her heart stood still with horror.

The word checked Mrs. Coolidge, in spite of her insolent self-assurance, and, bad as her language had been, she was ever after glad that she had not uttered that last maddening word.

To be accused of theft had been almost more than Brownie could bear.

A Douglas accused of stealing!

But the other insinuation! She had hardly been able to comprehend it at first.

She grew sick at heart, dizzy and faint, when the woman's meaning at length burst upon and nearly crushed her.

For one moment her blood seemed turned to ice, and her brain to fire.

The next, conscious virtue asserted itself.

The proud figure grew more proudly erect, the little head was lifted with a haughty grace, and Queen Margaret Tudor herself, of whom Miss Mehetabel had been wont to boast, would have gloried in the majesty of her appearance.

Then the pained, almost convulsed expression about her delicate mouth relaxed into a withering smile of scorn.

What were these two base spirits, that she, a Douglas, with royal blood in her veins, should fear them?

She turned her blazing eyes full upon her accusors, and she found they could not bear the glance; their eyes dropped guitily beneath it.

Then, with that mighty calmness in her tones and manner, Brownie said to Mrs. Coolidge:

"Have you anything further to say to me regarding those jewels, madam?"

"Not unless I can persuade you to confess and make restitution," she answered uneasily.

"I have no confession to make; I have no restitution to make. Those articles of jewelry are legally mine—how, I do not intend to explain to ou, either now or at any other time. The manner in which you or your daughter became possessed of them does you infinite credit; it is an act of which you doubtless will be proud all your life. Now, if you please, I will relieve you of them; and from this moment consider my engagement with you at an end, as, after such repeated insults I could no longer remain in your family."

She reached forth her hand to take the casket, but Mrs. Coolidge clutched it with the grip of a miser.

"Oh, no, Miss Douglas, you cannot have this again; you have not yet proved to me that it is yours, and I cannot allow such a valuable possession to go out of my hands until I am assured who the rightful owner is."

She sneered, white with anger, that the girl should dare brave her so.

"You can put on as many grand airs as you choose, miss, but you'll find that we know how to take them for just what they are worth," said Isabel scoffingly.

"Mrs. Coolidge, that box and all its contents are mine, and I demand that you yield it up to me," Brownie said sternly, fully aroused.

"Hear the minx, mamma; do dismiss her instantly," cried Isabel angrily.

"You cannot have them, Miss Douglas, until you prove that they are yours," returned Mrs. Coolidge firmly, and she closed the box with a snap.

"Then I shall be obliged to take legal measures to obtain them," returned the young girl, with decision.

"Ha, ha! hear her, mamma. She speaks like a princess, and she says she shall consider her engagement with you at an end, as if that were a matter she only can decide," cried Isabel, actually quivering with rage.

Brownie noticed her by neither word nor look.

Addressing Mrs. Coolidge again very gently, she said:

"Once more, madam, will you give up my property?"

She spoke so imperatively that for a moment the woman was staggered, and began to think she had better yield the point, for if the girl should call in official aid it might make things very awkward and unpleasant.

Isabel saw her mother's indecision, and, stooping, she whispered in her ear:

"Don't you do it, mamma; wait until papa comes, at least."

"You prize them very highly?" Mrs. Coolidge asked, after a moment's thought.

"I do."

"They are not suitable for you to wear in your position; you are poor—could you be persuaded to part with them for a consideration?"

A sudden idea had come to her that if she could persuade the governess to sell them, they would hush the matter up among themselves.

She was greedy for the jewels, and was determined that they should not go out of her hands if she could help it.

"What do you mean by 'a consideration', madam?" asked Miss Douglas in a peculiar tone.

"Why, if I should pay you something handsome for them, and pledge myself to say nothing more about the matter, would you give them up?"

"Really, Mrs. Coolidge, you are very discriminating in your ideas of honesty. You assert that I have stolen these things. Would you be willing to purchase stolen property?"

The woman's face grew crimson with rage at this shaft.

"You can leave the room, Miss Douglas, your insolence is insufferable," she cried, rising and pointing with her shaking finger to the door.

"You understand me, madam; I shall take the law, unless you give me my property," returned the young girl, calmly confronting her, and taking no notice of her command.

"Take the law, then; you'll have a fight of it, if you do, let me tell you, for no one will believe the tale of a governess, who has been dismissed for unworthy conduct. No, go!" cried the irate woman, almost beside herself with passion.

Brownie uttered no words, but walked like a queen from the room, but once within her own, she broke down utterly.

To lose those treasures, which had been the silent companions of her heart-broken aunt during all those lonely years, and around which clustered so much of hope and despair, was more than she could bear.

The little chain, too, with its golden key, which her aunt had told her to wear as long as she lived, that, too, was in the power of these cruel women.

She grew nearly wild over the thought of her loss.

She must have them again—she would have them, but how to get them was the question.

She realized all the difficulties which lay in her path.

She was a stranger in this foreign land without a friend outside the family to whom to turn in her hour of need.

If she should take the law as she had threatened no one would believe the story, as Mrs. Coolidge had said.

Only Isabel and her mother knew anything of what had just transpired, and if they should repeat her statement, how could she help herself, for who, indeed, would believe that a poor governess owned such valuables?

The more she thought the more hopeless her case seemed to become.

Once her thoughts turned involuntarily to Adrian Dredmond; perhaps he would help her.

But her maidenly delicacy recoiled from asking aid from him, a stranger.

Where should she go? What should she do?

MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

suppose a lot of you who responded to the request my letter of last March in behalf of Ruth (my little plet), have begun to think I did not appreciate your liness, as I could not reply to each and every one of dear sisters, and the many who were not sisters sent flower seeds and playthings. Please let this a personal "Thank you" to each and every one who so kind to my darling. I can truthfully say last mer was the happiest part of her life, and it was because of your kindness.

wish I could picture her flower garden to you but t would be impossible. It was truly a United States den, flowers and flower seeds from every state in Union. Everyone who saw her garden praised the uty of it. Picture to yourselves a brown-eyed, curly- aded tot of five summers sitting flat upon the ground m early morn till night, busy as a bee among her vers, talking to them as though they were human be- s. Honestly, I did not know before that there were many people that possessed such kind hearts. I am amed of my heretofore narrow-mindedness. God bless one and all who so kindly contributed to her asure.

Sisters, how many of you have made any of the new ndow shades, using a good grade of brown or un- ached domestic, about two yards in length? Draw eads at one end and hemstitch an inch wide hem to run stick in on bottom of shade. Whip some pretty crocheted lace onto hem, stretch and iron and tack on- to an old shade roller. You have a lovely window shade. Of course they can be varied.

At this writing the grain fields of this part of Texas are a carpet of green. There are very few hills here, mostly level land, and for miles you can see nothing but green. Wheat did not do good this past year. It was too hot and dry.

If Mrs. Frances Roth, Long Island, New York, sees this will she please write me, giving her address in full. Thank you one and all. MRS. P. E. BOSWELL.

IRVINGTON, N. J.

DEAR COMFORT FAMILY:

I never wrote before and have never failed to read COMFORT. I am writing for information and company. I feel like the sister from Cleveland, "in the midst of the crowd I am lonesome." I want to offer a suggestion. If you are lonesome, get busy. I keep a list of those less fortunate than I and on blue days I go through my scrap book, writing letters of clippings, recalling historical events, dissecting someone's funny experience, getting a laugh out of every remark; when that's done my blues are gone. Now I have a neighbor who gets melancholy when she sees the leaves come down. Here's how I cured her and helped myself. We each bought a yard and a half of fifty-four inch goods called Indian Head, seven yards of so-called Cluny lace, and a few skeins of strand floss, a total outlay of $1.50. I am handy with a pencil and carbon paper, so I traced a bunch of cherries and a robber robin on two corners of our goods. Then while we chatted we worked. In three days we had used our odd moments to the tune of a beautiful colored tablecloth. My neighbor's was very crude as she had never tried her hand before. But our blues melted away.

Now for another, keep a list of family and friends' birthdays. As each one arrives, subscribe for COMFORT for them for a year. It is easier than ordering for the whole crowd at Christmas.

Will someone from Gainesville, Georgia, or New Holland or thereabouts, write about the climate, opportunities for work, etc., and I'll try to repay them.

Yours, with best wishes,

ONE HORSE TOWNSMAN.

OREGON CITY, 916 WASH. ST., OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have enjoyed your department and the sisters' letters for a long time and wish to thank all for many new ideas. May I add my bit by telling you of a simple puzzle which I have often made to amuse the children of my friends? Perhaps it may help Sada to amuse her small boys on some rainy afternoon.

The bright colored picture covers on many of the current magazines are fine to use as they are usually well adapted for the purpose though any colored pictures will do. Procure some heavy cardboard of the same size as picture and after trimming off any unnecessary lettering on picture, paste on cardboard with a good flour paste and put under a weighted board to dry. When dry, lay on table, picture side down and with a ruler and pencil take off in squares, triangles or any odd shapes, being careful not to mark in too small pieces or narrow joints which will be easily broken. Cut on lines with scissors. The children will work for hours trying to put the pieces together to form the complete picture and it is even interesting to the grown-ups. It teaches the little ones a good lesson in perseverence. Pictures of animals are fine to use and a picture puzzle of Santa Claus makes an appropriate Christmas gift.

To the sisters who live on a farm and make their own soap, I am giving my mother's method of making soap grease from an otherwise waste product. Whenever she had a new milch cow she took from the second to ninth milking all milk not fed to calf, strained through a clean cloth and set it in pans or crocks. When cream was ready she skimmed it into a clean pail or other receptacle, stirring well after each skimming. When all cream was added she churned it with a wooden paddle, made from a clean board, gathered the butter and washed in cold water until milk was removed. The result was a nice lot of clean fat which in these times of high prices means quite a saving to those who make their own soap.

I would like a few correspondents, preferably those in remote places who have either few home ties or friends and to whom it would be a pleasure to receive and write long, friendly letters. My education has been limited principally to reading and travel and my heart turns more to the wild and less settled parts of our country, the mountains, forests and streams, the works of God, are wonderful and an inspiration to all that is best in me.

Best wishes to all the sisters. MARGARET.

DOWN IN MAINE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been an interested listener to your chats for some time and have gleaned much good from so doing.

I am twenty-nine years old and have been married three years last July.

I have had eleven years' experience in the schoolroom, mostly rural schools, and in so doing have lived in many different communities and have always been an interested student of human nature. Now I am wondering what the sisters think of the girl of today. To me, the pace that our girls are setting is actually appalling. But perhaps I am narrow minded or old fashioned. I would like to have this subject open to discussion. I am not referring to the styles in clothing, though really clothes go a long way in making the character of the growing girl, but the moral attitude. I live within thirty minutes' ride by automobile of three of the most prominent summer resorts on the Maine coast and I see a good deal of the young people on the streets especially. We hear the argument that it is no more harm for a girl to smoke than a boy. It has always been an established fact that woman as a whole has a higher moral standard than man and throughout the ages it is woman who exerts the moral influence; now when our girls take up the vices of men and even seek to outdo them along that line, what are our men to have to look up to?

I am thankful I have no children for as I look around me in the different communities I can't see any group of young people that I would feel easy about my boy or girl being identified with. I do think young people should enjoy the society of others and it would be a difficult task to pick and choose. Now am I narrow minded—what do you think, sisters? One thing more, if our girls were taught to eat reasonable food and lead clean lives, nature would furnish all the cosmetics they need. The vigorous use of a wash-cloth at stated times would accomplish more than many layers of rouge and powder. A good cold cream and a little powder for the nose are useful things to have but these are enough.

Hoping to hear some interesting letters on this subject, I remain, Sincerely, POLLY.

MARTELLE, IOWA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have long been a reader of COMFORT and it is my favorite among ten or a dozen magazines, papers, etc. I have never felt as though I could write anything that would be as helpful as the other letters until I read Sada's letter in July COMFORT in regard to rainy day games or plays for little boys. Of course my boy is larger than hers, but he gets lonesome when the older boy is out making hay with Dad and he comes in and gets his letter blocks, dominoes, toy windmill, the round boxes mantles come in, and marbles and builds a farm. Dominoes make the fences, pasteboard boxes of different sizes make the barns, house, etc., and marbles are the hogs. The mantle boxes are twin silos, beside the barn and windmill. A baking powder can will do for a water tank or could be used for silo. Donald has little toy tractors and he hitches something on behind for plow, road grader or binder. If there are two boys one can be the boss and the other the hired man. Let them have a corner of the room for their play and when they are tired of it for that day have them put it away. Donald is seven but he plays by the hour by himself. Save spools, boxes, cans, etc., and if they have tinker toys or a toy windmill they can have a nice farm.

Love to all, also thanks for all the helps I have received in my eighteen years of reading COMFORT.

MRS. W. B. MEERS.

JACKSONVILLE, 121 FLA. AVE., FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Just a note to thank you for the library view and to send you a couple of snapshots of myself and kiddies for your album. I know snapshots don't reproduce well enough to be published so these are for you alone.

I received around five hundred pieces of mail in answer to my letter in last March COMFORT but have a hundred or still unanswered because I did not have any success in borrowing that typewriter. However, I intend to answer them, for they were interesting and many wanted to know something about Florida's wonderful climate, and I may as well tell something about Florida for the benefit of those whom I have been unable to answer.

We have nine months of summer and three months of spring, which are December, January and February. It really gets quite cold sometimes but seldom freezes. We have flowers all winter, the poinsettias, cosmos, dahlias, English daisies, pansies, yellow jasmine, azaleas, violets and roses, as well as some flowering trees and wild flowers. Magnolia and sweet bay trees are among the sweetest. Magnolia trees grow to a great height with very large leaves, smooth and dark. The

A 10-Day Test

Which ten million people have made

This delightful test which we offer you has been made by ten million people. It has taught the homes of some 50 nations a new teeth-cleaning method.

Dentists the world over also urge this method. Thus the past five years have opened a new dental era.

If you don't know these benefits, send and learn them now.

Combat the film

Try combating the film on teeth. See how they improve.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Discolored by stains, it forms dingy coats. Tartar is based on film. That's why beautiful teeth were seen less often than now.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

Very few escaped

Old ways of brushing left much of that film intact. There it remained to constantly threaten serious damage. So, despite all care, tooth troubles were increasing until very few escaped.

Then dental science sought ways to fight that film. After long research, two ways were discovered. One acts to curdle film, one to remove it, and without any harmful scouring.

Able authorities proved these methods effective. Then dentists began to advise them. A new-type tooth paste was created, based on modern research. Those two film combatants were embodied in it for daily application. That tooth paste, called Pepsodent, is now used wherever careful people live.

Combats acids, too

Pepsodent brings other much-desired effects. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids, the cause of tooth decay.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits on teeth which may otherwise ferment and form acids.

Thus every use gives manifold power to Nature's great tooth-protecting agents in the mouth.

Teeth glisten everywhere today

You can see the results wherever you look. Teeth glisten which once were dim. Beautiful teeth are now more common, and people smile to show them.

Those prettier teeth mean cleaner, safer teeth. They mean that those people will hereafter have better tooth protection. They mean that children are better protected from what you may have suffered from the teeth.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

A few days will convince you that you need this method. Cut out the coupon now.

Taking Comfort

Safely assuming that your girl is artistic and keeps more or less in touch with ideas of modern furnishings, she will first put a neutral shade on the walls and floor, and rely on her cushions, table covers, books and other small, bright-colored objects to give the needed touch of color. It will all have an informal and homelike appearance, and there will be little in the room that matches, chintz and cretonne being much in evidence.

As all girls know how to use a brush, they can freshen the floor, furniture and bedstead with a coat of paint. They will find a way to make effective rugs from scraps, and cardboard will be the foundation for picture frames and baskets. A cretonne covered utility box set under the window to receive things to be gotten out of sight in a hurry must be made, for "girls will be girls." Give them a chance and they will transform an uninteresting, uninviting room into a place of tranquility and charm, which may have points well worth repeating in the living-room.

In general, the housewife cannot prudently overlook sleeping-room comforts for it is there that about one-third of every 24 hours is spent. They may be severely plain, and should be if there is much work for few hands. Money is well spent in good mattresses and springs. Mattresses should have fitted covers made from unbleached muslin. There are not a few ways of improvising chamber comforts. A very attractive dressing table can be made from two shelves held together with sides and covered with valance and scarf. A long deep shelf with hooks screwed to the under side and a cretonne curtain makes a clothes-hanging place away from the dust. Wooden boxes may have covers hinged on to use as shoe boxes, and with a fitted slip-on cover they make good-looking seats.

The general living-room comes next in order and claims much of the housewife's attention. The several scenes illustrated on the cover can well be made into one, providing the room is spacious. Space, however, may be an illusion, for a moderate-size room may give a sense of larger proportions through color, arrangement and decorations. A light ceiling with a light neutral tone for the walls and a large rug of solid color gives the effect of spaciousness and calm. Avoid red in the house; it is distinctly an out-of-door color.

In arranging the furniture, make a study of its uses. A desk should be to one side where one may sit uninterrupted. Small chairs are set in odd places ready to be brought forth when required. Larger chairs are more in evidence but should appear to have been placed for a particular purpose. Near a reading table, a sewing table, or near a bookcase they suggest harmony. A sofa with long table at the back is a complete arrangement in itself, as shown in illustration.

Built-in furniture is receiving considerable attention in these days of smaller houses. The built-in bookcases are about the only kind we see, and with the top shelf used for bric-a-brac the effect is altogether decorative, and the cost of construction very small. If you have an odd-shaped jog in your living-room it can be converted into a pleasant corner in which to read or sew by building in a settle and making a mattress cushion to fit. The seat may be hinged and the space beneath used for storage.

The living-room should never have a crowded appearance. The value of pictures are often impaired by hanging them too closely together or with a disregard for subjects. Simplicity increases the artistic merits of a room, besides saving a vast amount of cleaning and dusting.

Bags in Attractive Design

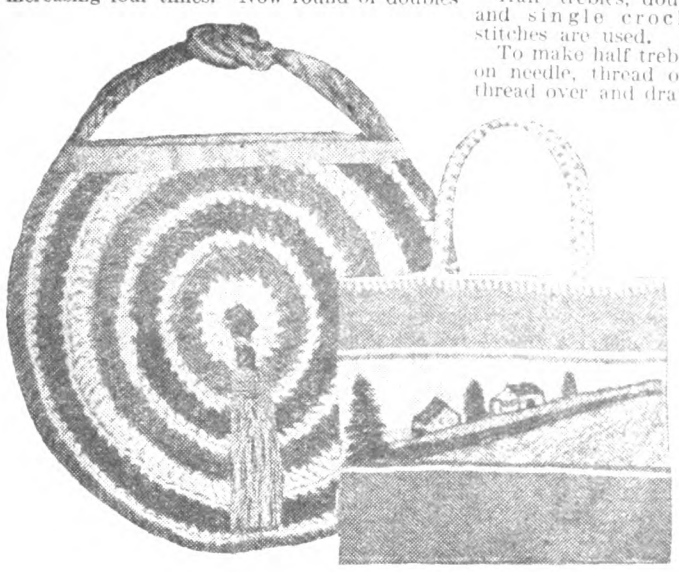
Original Tiger Lily design submitted by Mrs. T. E. McInnis, Texas Leaves and stems light green, lily red, overlaid with 4 dark blue applique pieces arranged around a 6-sided yellow center. The bud is of red, cut in points which are appliqued on to yellow.

Bags and Baskets

FANCY differs greatly, but the variety is so great, and the uses so many, any woman can scarcely have too great a collection from which to choose the right sort for a certain purpose or occasion.

Jute or Cord Bag

So attractive, strong and useful are these for shopping or marketing, every woman is fortunate in the possession of one.



A new cord is on the market in a variety of colors especially for these crocheted bags.

A coarse crochet hook is necessary. Two balls will make a small bag. Work around and around completing each round of two colors. Use darker for ch 2. Ten s c into 1 st ch, ch 1, 2 s c into each st, join, do not break thread. With lighter cord, 1 d c in s c, 2 d c in next s c, working through one loop each stitch only, repeat, join. 3rd round—Pick up dark, work 1 d c in each first two stitches, 2 d c in third stitch, repeat, join, 4th round—Singles of light increasing four times. Now round of doubles followed by round of singles, increasing just enough to keep work flat.

Last rounds all of doubles. Make another circle to match. Join by crocheting together. to finish, as shown, fold in tops, line with black oilcloth or surf satin and finish with a binding. To make good strong handle, crochet chs and braid three together, tie knot in center, sew securely to sides. Tassels may be added to the centers or not as preferred.

Children's school bags, crocheted in plain filet darned in with designs in bright wools, can be more quickly made up of jute, in similar fashion, starting with a ch and working rounds of spaces.

Some attractive models of these will be illustrated later.

JUTE OR CORD BAG.

HOMESPUN WORK BAG.

Homespun Work Bags

These gaily-colored bags with their quaint, crude embroidery, are very fascinating.

The original was 13 inches wide by 12 deep when finished. Natural grey or a color can be used, darning the landscape with wools. Outline houses, road and trees. Use a running stitch for sky (blue), road (tan), fields (green), houses (white), roofs (red), outlined with fine black. Trees, one or more shades of green.

Line with unbleached muslin and buttonhole the top, using cornered cords cross-stitched for handles.

Crash Knitting Bag

Natural Russian crash, in size 15 inches wide by 14 deep, was used effectively in this model. Decoration represents flowers above a wall; use red, coarse mercerized rope for bricks, then mark off with white, and silkateen for flowers. These are of numerous shades, made by ch 3, join, fill with d c, join ch 2, 2 s c in each double repeat using two or three shades of a color in each flower. Leaves and stem, green outline and lazy-daisy stitches. Line with red sateen, making narrow bind around top. Handle, two-inch double-crash finished, and end joined to center of each side.

Crocheted Shopping Bag

By Janie Becker

Material required; Three balls cotton pearl No. 3 in delft blue, 1 ball of white and 1 ball of green—No. 2 steel crochet hook.

Half trebles, doubles and single crochet stitches are used.

To make half treble—h t c: Having a stitch on needle, thread over, hook through work, thread over and draw through work, making three stitches on needle, over and draw through the three stitches.

1st round—Ch 5, 1 h t c in 3rd st * sk 2, a shell of 1 h t c ch 2, 1 h t c in the next st.* Repeat from * to * all around chain.

2nd round—1 shell under ch of each shell in 1st round. Crochet 32 rounds in this way.

With white crochet around: 3 h t c under each ch 2 (no chs between).

Another round of white: 3 h t c in each space between the groups of 3 h t c of last round.

With blue: 1 round like 2nd round of bag, making the shells between the white shells.

Bottom of bag: with blue ch 25, turn. Crochet shells as in 1st round of bag on both sides of this ch, working an extra shell at each end.

Work all around; 1 shell in each shell making an extra shell in each corner.

Continue working in this way, increasing at each corner in each round, keeping corners square, until the piece measures—from corner to corner—5 inches wide by about 7½ inches long. Crochet in place, by slip st to 1st round on the wrong side.

To Make Handles

With blue ch 95, and make a h t c in each st. Work shells like those of bag, on each side of the row of h t c.

Make two handles, one for each side of bag, place ends of handles inside the bag about two inches, sew securely and in place.

To Make the Flower

With white ch 5, join.

1st round—15 d c in ring.

2nd round—2 d c in each d c.

To make a point: * 7 d c in 7 d c, turn, repeat from * twice. Skip 1 d c, 6 d c in 6 d c, turn. Skip 1 d c, 3 d c in 3 d c, skip next d c, d c in last d c, turn. 2 d c in 2 d c, skip 1, d c in last d c, turn. 2 d c, turn. 1 d c, finish off and break thread leaving a long end to sew in place.

Crochet 4 more points, making the 1st d c for each, in the same d c with 7th d c of previous point.

To Make Leaf

With green ch 7.

1st row—1 d c in 2nd st, skip 3, 2 d c in 2 sts turn.

2nd row—4 d c in 4 sts, turn.

3rd row—7 d c in the 4 d c, turn.

4th, 5th, 6th rows—7 d c in 7 d c, turn at end of each row.

7th row—3 d c in 3 d c, 3 d c in next, 3 d c in 3 d c, turn.

8th row—4 d c, 3 d c in next, 4 d c, turn.

9th row—1 d c in each d c, turn.

10th row—5 d c, 2 d c in next, 5 d c, turn.

11th row—6 d c, ch 1, 6 d c, turn.

12th row—13 d c, turn.

13th row—15 d c, making 3 d c in 7th st, turn.

14th row—Same as 9th row.

15th row—Skip 1 d c, 6 d c in 6 d c, 3 d c in next, 6 d c in 6 d c, skipping next to last d c.

16th row—Same as 9th row.

17th row—Same as 15th row.

18th row—Same as 9th row.

19th row—Same as 15th row.

20th row—Same as 9th row.

21st row—Same as 15th row to center of leaf, ch 9 for stem, 7 s c in 7 sts of ch, then 6 d c on leaf same as in 15th row. Crochet two leaves.

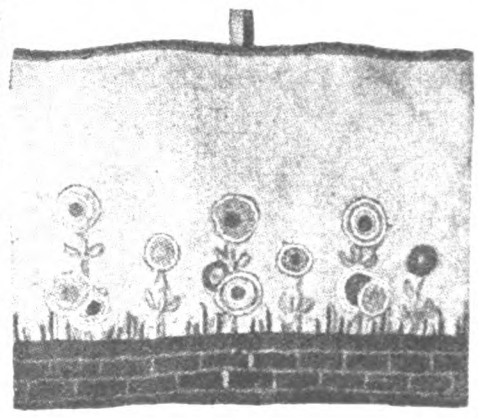
To Make a Bud

With white ch 4.

1st row—3 d c in 3 sts turn at end of each row.

2nd row—5 d c making 2 in 1st d c, and 2 in last.

3rd row—1 d c in each st.



4th row—D c in d c, 2 d c in 2nd d c, 1 d c; d in 4th d c; 1 d c.

5th row—8 d c, making 2 d c in 4th d c.

6th row—10 d c, making 2 d c in 4th and 2 in 5 d c.

7th row—Skip 1 d c, 3 d c in 3 d c, 2 d c in next, ch 1, 2 d c in next, 3 d c in 3 d c, skipping next to last d c.

Crochet another bud, making it one row larger.

CRASH KNITTING BAG.

Sepals and Stem for Buds

With green make 1st and 2nd rows same as bud.

3rd row—6 d c.

Now make a point by making 2 d c in 2 d c, turn, 2 d c in the 2 d c, turn, 2 d c in the 2 d c, turn, 1 d c, ch 1, turn. s c down side of point.

Make another point in next 2 sts, and a point in last 2 sts; after last point, s c down side to center of lower edge, where a stem is made.

Arrange flowers and leaves on bag and sew in place.

This original design by Miss Becker results in a bag which is as strong and firm as it is attractive.

It is an idea which could also be copied successfully in jute of natural color and trimmed with the decoration crocheted in colors.

Crocheted Pouch Bag

The little bag shown measuring five inches in width by seven deep, is of Alice blue sateen with a two-inch navy-blue band in which are worked rosebuds and leaves.

Almost any colors can be worked out attractively in this manner and the bag can also be easily made as much larger as one wishes by increasing the bottom.

Materials needed—Two balls Alice blue, one ball navy, one ball leaf green, one ball of rose, one ball canary, steel hook No. 12.

Work is begun in center of bottom by making ch 5, join in ring, 9 s c in ring. Next round, 2 s c in each st, join, ch 1. In working take up both loops of each stitch, as it makes it much stronger.

3rd round—2 s c in first st, 1 s c in next 2 sts, 2 s c in 4th st, repeat, thus having six sides. Join to first st, ch 1.

4th round—2 s c in the first of each 2 sts, 1 s c in st between. Care should be taken to always enlarge in the right stitch if the result is to be even.

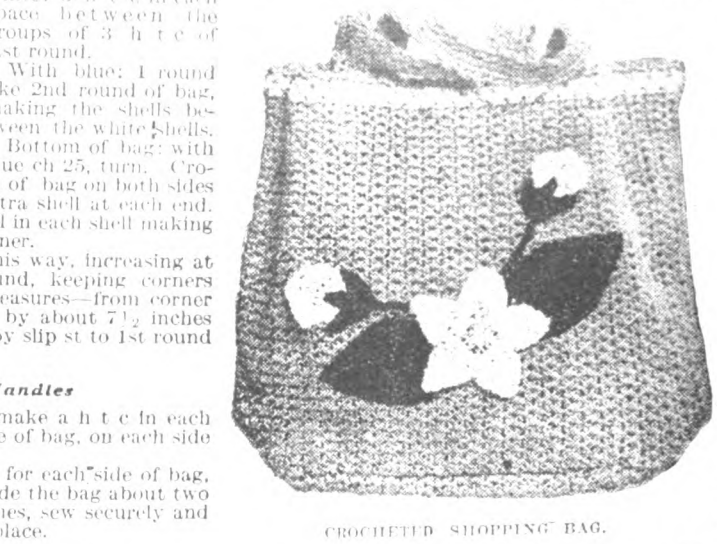
Continue in rounds as directed until one has 18 sts on each side.

Next two rounds, 1 s c in each st.

1st row of pattern—2 blue sts worked over green by simply holding on top of sts of last row, 4 sts green, 17 blue, worked over the green. Drop green out on wrong side or simply cease to work over it, in last 2 blue sts, join ch 1.

2nd row—2 blue, 3 green worked over blue, 15 blue worked over the green. 3 green, 15 blue, repeat, dropping green as in last row before joining.

3rd row—1 blue, 5 green, 13 blue, 5 green, 13 blue, repeat, join each as heretofore directed.



4th row—2 blue, 3 green over the center of 5 green, 15 blue, 5 green, 15 blue, repeat, join.

5th row—3 blue, 1 green, 17 blue, repeat, join.

6th and 7th rows—All blue.

8th row—1st blue, 1 yellow, 1 blue, repeat, join.

9th row—All blue.

CROCHETED SHOPPING BAG.

POUCH BAG.

10th row—8 blue, 2 green, 2 blue, 1 green, repeat, join.

21st row—7 blue, 2 green, 4 blue, repeat, join.

22nd row—6 blue, 3 green, 3 blue, repeat, join.

23rd row—5 blue 4 green, repeat, join.

24th row—4 blue, 2 green, 3 blue, 1 green, repeat, join.

25th row—3 blue, 1 green, 2 blue, 2 green, 6 blue, repeat, join.

26th and 28th rows—All navy blue.

29th row—All Alice blue.

Next three rows same as the 8th, 9th, 10th rows.

Next 14 rows all Alice blue. Then sk 2 s c, 1 d c, ch 3, sk 2 s c, 1 d c, join to first ch.

TATTED ROSE MEDALLION.

One row of scallops, made as follows: under ch 3, 1 s c under next ch; 1 s c. Add a picot edge of yellow.

Cord and tassel can be made of the blue or a combination of colors.

Terms Used in Tatting

D s, double stitch; p, picot; l p, long p; s p, shorter than usual picot; ch, chain; succession of double stitches made with threads; pkt, picot and knot together. * indicates a repetition.

If You Like to Tat

The tatting patterns we illustrate this month, we feel sure will appeal to all lovers of this sort of work.

Medallions can be used in such numerous ways. New combinations of rings and chains always prove of value.

The two patterns by Miss Davis are unusually firm and an apparent richness is added by the chain surrounded rings which is not the ordinary.

Tatted Rose Medallion

By Evelyn Davis

Single medallions can be inserted, or joined to form bands, camisole yokes, scarf ends, the collars being among the possibilities. To add to its lacelike appearance a medallion can also be used in the corner of tatting trimmed handkerchief, such as is illustrated

* Work is begun in the center with shuttle 1 d s (1 long p, 2 d s), repeat 7 times, 1 long p, 1 d s, close to form ring.

Join thread to last p, working with 2 threads make ch 6 d s. Join to second long p. Repeat around.

Third round is chains of 8 d s, joined to ch just over long picots.

Fourth round—Chs 10 d s joined to ch in round in same place

Fifth round—Ch 3 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2

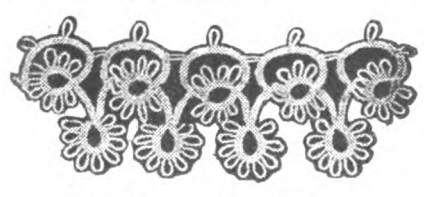
TATTING EDGED HANDKERCHIEF.

Two Original Tatting Designs

By Mary Ratliff

The narrow pattern illustrated (below) requires two threads so it can be worked of two colors if one desires. As a finish for the now popular colored handkerchiefs it is very effective if the rings are white and the chains of cotton to match the linen.

TATTING EDGE FOR HANDKERCHIEF.

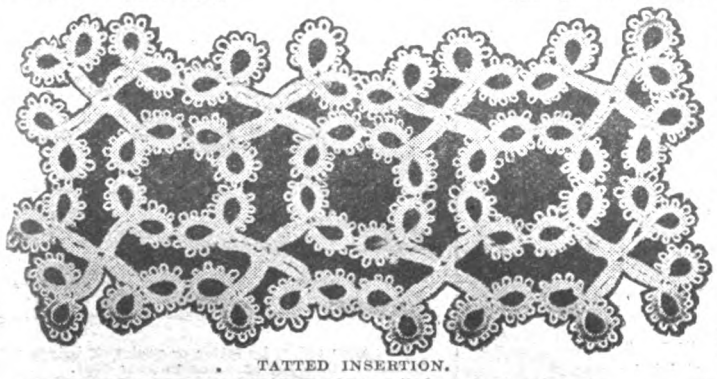


With shuttle make ring of 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close. With two threads make ch 9 d s, 1 p, 9 d s, join to center p of ring.

Repeat, alternating the rings and chains.

Double Ring Edging

This is another two-thread pattern, simple but very pretty.



Begin with ring of 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, close.

TWO-THREAD TATTING PATTERN.

Chain 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, join to fifth p of ring. 8 d s, ring of 9 p, same as the first ring. 8 d s.

A ring same as the first ch 8 d s, join to third p of first ch. 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, join to fifth p of third ring.

TATTED INSERTION.

Ch 8 d s, 1 ring ch 8 d s, ring 3 p, ch. Repeat for the required length.

Tatted Insertion

By Evelyn Davis

This original design is unusually firm as the chains are all double.

Begin with 9 p, ring with 2 d s between, at the beginning and to close. Make a second ring joining first p to last p of first ring. Ch 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s. Two more rings joined as before, ch 6 d s, join to p of first ch. Ch 6 d s. Two rings joined. Ch 6 d s. Join to first ch. Ch 6 d s. Two rings, ch 6 d s, join, ch 6 d s, join to first ring.

This finishes one small square, the pattern being made of these, joining the picots as follows:

Join center p of second ring of second square to center p of the seventh p ring of the first square. Join center p of third ring to center p of sixth ring of the first square.

Make two rows by joining these little squares in this way, then join the rows to make the finished band of insertion.

To do this put the rows together, squares opposite each other and join the rows by centers picots as shown in the illustration.

Four of the squares worked together make an attractive square medallion.

Wide Tatted Edge

Begin with center ring of 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, close, join, break thread.

* With 2 threads ch 5 d s, ring 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, for inner ring.

Ch 2 d s, 4 p, with 2 d s between. 2 d s, join to p of ring.

Repeat ch and join to base of ring. Ch 5 d s, join to p of center ring. Repeat from * 3 times, join and break thread.

This center motif is surrounded by 10 squares each of 4 double rings, joined as shown, 4 squares along the top, 2 on either side and 2 at the bottom.

1Squares—Small center ring of 4 p with 2 d s between ,ch 2 d s, ring 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, close, ch 2 d s, join to p of center ring, ch 2 d s, 4 p, with 2 d s between 2 d s, join to p of ring. Ch 4 p as before, join to ch 2 d s.

Repeat 3 times, joining first and last picots of chain to hold 4 double rings in place.

Join rings of 2 squares to center p of each of the 4 rings of the center motif as shown.

Camisole Yoke of Two Colors

This pretty pattern is worked throughout with white rings and pink chains, the rose which finishes the front also being of pink.

To make the camisole band wind a shuttle with white and make one of the top free rings as follows:

2 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, close.

Working with 2 threads make a pink chain of 8 d s, then * 1 ring same as the first. Pink, ch 7 d s, 1 p, 7 d s. Repeat from * until one has 6 rings (counting from the second) with p chains between. * After sixth ring ch 7 d s, 1 p, ch 11 d s, 3 p, ch 11 d s, 1 p, ch 7 d s, 1 ring, joining to center p of sixth ring (see bottom of bands).

Picot chs between 5 more rings each one joined to center p of the opposite ring. Ch 8 d s, on 5 p ring. Ch 8 d s. 6 rings with chs between joined to second row of chs. Repeat from *.

To make shoulder straps begin with group of 4 rings using the pink or colored cotton.

First ring 3 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, close. In second ring join center p to second p of a ring which is joined to an opposite white ring.

Make third and fourth rings free.

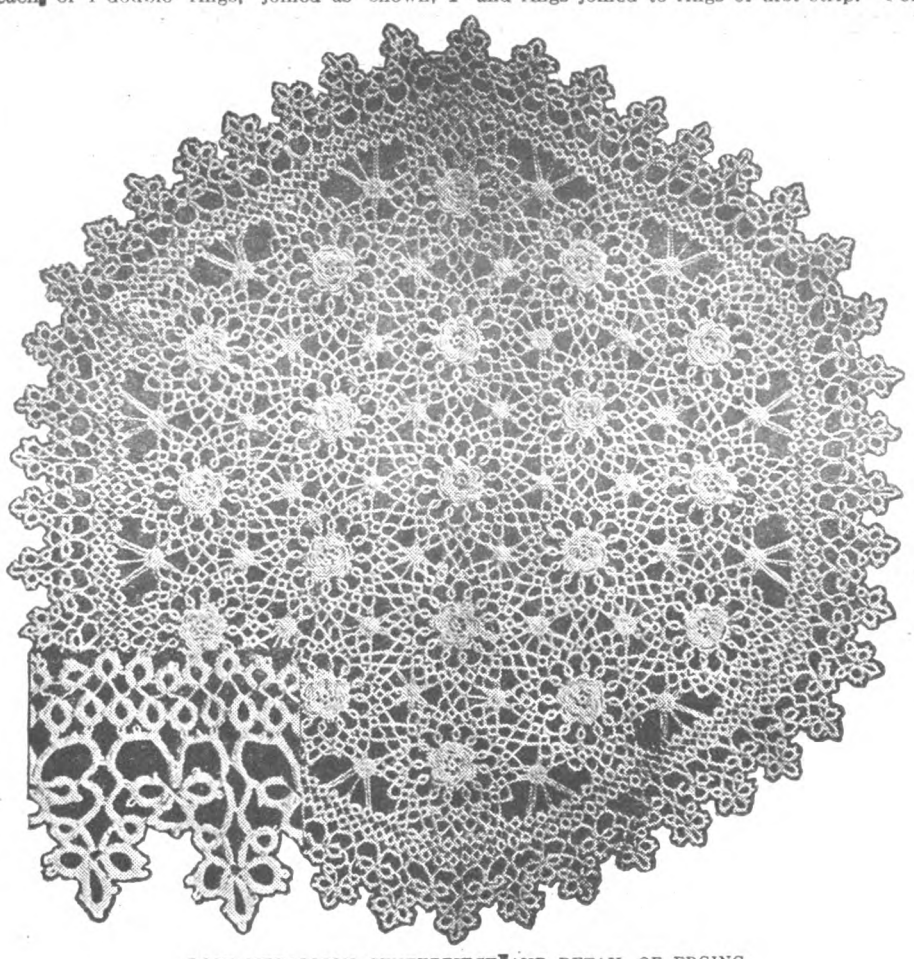
 With white make 5 p ring, ch 7 d s, 1 p, ch 7 d s. 25 more white rings with pink picot chs. between. Ch 8 d s, 1 ring joining center p to center p of ninth free ring, counting from first ring beyond 2 white rings to which group of 4 pink rings is joined. This will allow 2 rings to join strap to the back, 6 under arm rings and 1 ring for the front strap.

Now make 4 pink rings, joining center p of first ring to second p of same with ring to which last p was joined. Join center p of second pink ring to second p of second ring in group of 2 white rings (see illustration).

Third and fourth rings free. Now continuing with shoulder strap. Ch 8 d s, 1 ring joining second p to center p of fourth pink ring. Make chs and rings joining chs to picots in ch of first row.

Finish with ch 8 d s, 1 ring joining second p to center p of third pink ring, ch 8 d s, join to first ring. Break thread after tying securely.

Now copy directions from  joining ring after ch 8 d s, at end to center p of first free ring beyond first group of pink rings. Join next p of same ring to center p of first pink ring. Ch 8 d s, 1 ring, joining second p to center p of fourth pink ring. Now chs. join to chs. in last row and rings joined to rings of first strip. Complete by joining last ch 8 d s, to first ring on this side.



Repeat for other strap.

For a size 36 yoke one will need to make 38 free rings at the top of the tatted band. Of these allow 9 for both the front and back, 2 for each shoulder strap on both front and back and 6 for the under arm spaces between the straps.

For a larger size add to the number of rings across the front, and also across the back if necessary.

For the tatted rose which ornaments the front, use the pink cotton, following directions from * to * in Rose Medallion, with this exception, in 5th round make chs 12 d s.

6th round—7 p, chs with 2 d s between

ROSE MEDALLION CENTERPIECE AND DETAIL OF EDGING.

Rose Medallion Centerpiece

By Elsie Corbin

This effective and original design has the center formed of 19 medallions (see Fig. 1) each consisting of a tatted pink rose center, surrounded by rings and chains of ecru cotton. All white can of course be used if preferred. Tatted Rose; wind shuttle with pink cotton and make ring of 6 p with 2 d s between, close.

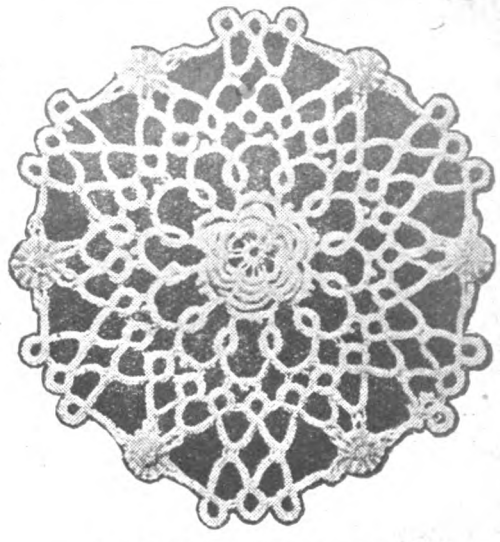
2nd round—Join in second thread by tying to p ch 6 d s, join to next p, repeat around.

3rd round—Same as last making chains of 8 d s.

4th round—Chains 10 d s.

5th round—Chains 12 d s.

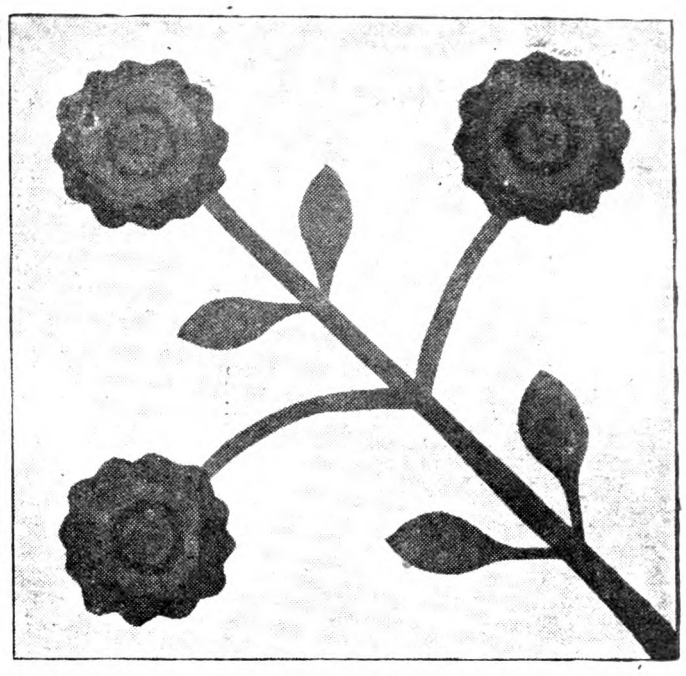
6th round—Ch 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s. Fasten securely and break thread.



This completes rose. Make 18 more roses in the same way.

With 2 ecru threads make 1st row around rose—ring 8 d s, join to 1st p in last petal of rose, 8 d s, close. Ch 4 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 ring same as last joining to last p in same petal of rose. Repeat rings and chains making 12 of each.

Fasten and break thread.



2nd round—2 rings of 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, joined to first and last picots of each ch. The side picots of rings being joined and the rings being separated by chains of 6 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 6 d s. Repeat around making 24 rings and chains.

Make the second medallion like first joining to first medallion by both picots of chain in last round. The third medallion is joined to first as just mentioned also to the second by 2 chains leaving 2 free chains between joinings. Join 6 medallions in this manner forming the second row of centerpiece, around the center medallion. The third round is joined in the same manner having 12 medallions always leaving 2 free chains on each medallion.

One of 4 blocks which are required to complete a design is here shown. Background unbleached. Leaves and stems green, roses have each centers of yellow, over red, then green, again red and green with scalloped edge. Blocks are set together with main stems crossing at the center. Submitted by Mrs. Rebecca McCray, Ohio.

Mrs. McHughes, Tenn., submitted another rose design. The larger center circle is of yellow overlaid with a smaller circle of red. These are surrounded by 4 pieces of red, with stems of green running between to the corners. Four small roses are of yellow with red centers.

What the Guest Should Not Do

By Mrs. Elizabeth Atwood

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IF your best friend were to tell you, as you were about to journey to another town to become the guest of a dear friend, to look out for the "twenty guest failures," you would doubtless be considerably puzzled until she explained that there are a score of ordinary little things the average guest does, for the most part unthinkingly, that are, nevertheless, unpleasant for the hostess.

Every woman who has entertained company knows full well that she delights in entertaining some of her friends and no matter whether they stay two days or three weeks, she always hates to have them go. On the other hand, there are other friends of whom she is quite fond in a general way, and yet the moment they become her guests there is a something about them and their methods that are not quite pleasant. The reason for this is undoubtedly in the fact that they do one or more of the twenty things that guests should not do. Here are the twenty:

Never "drop in" on a friend unexpectedly. Give her at least a little notice, even if you have to telegraph or telephone, and if you are invited, be sure and let her know the day and hour you expect to arrive, and just how you expect to arrive.

Unless you are going to spend an entire summer of three months as the guest of a friend, never take more than one trunk, and preferably a small one at that. You can pack your toilet articles and sleeping garments in your traveling bag, and you can get sufficient clothes in the medium-sized trunk for all needs for a period of anywhere from one to eight weeks. Furthermore, do not forget to put your sleeping garment in your traveling bag. Otherwise you will have to get them from your hostess in case your trunk is not delivered on the day of your arrival, which every traveling woman knows very frequently happens.

If the day is pleasant go ahead and talk about it. Praise the weather, tell how you enjoy it, but if the weather be unpleasant do not make any further comment upon it than to say it is raining. Do not say that it is miserable weather and you always feel badly when it is rainy, or otherwise grumble about the weather for this does not add to the comfort of your hostess one iota; rather, it makes her feel as though your visit was not pleasing you. Half a moment's reflection should suffice to convince you that your hostess is not in any manner whatever responsible for the weather.

If you remain long as a guest in the average household a little domestic unpleasantness is very likely to occur. No man or woman is absolutely perfect. Something may displease the host or hostess, and they may have a quiet word or two about it. Never under any consideration in the wide, wide world enter into any such conversation, never make any comments to either the host or hostess, and, above all, never appear to notice these things.

If you are invited to stay two weeks do not stay a day over two weeks. When your time is up your hostess will, of course, ask you to stay longer. She may mean it and be sincere about it, but unless something happens in the household where your presence would be a help, always make our departure at the specified time. If you make a practice of this you will be doubly welcome the next time. Bear in mind that your hostess may have plans she would like to carry out as soon as you leave, and if you do not leave on the specified time you may interfere with these plans.

If you are at a friend's house for any length of time there are always a number of little bills to be paid. There may be telegraph charges or long distance telephone charges. Make sure that your hostess has a "blanket" local service with her telephone, otherwise each call means payment of five cents. Then there are express bills, and laundry bills, and various other little bills. Make sure every one of these is paid before you go away.

No matter how well supplied your room may be with toilet articles, always bring your own. This includes everything for the toilet excepting, of course, towels, and one or two towels may also be taken in case you should spill any of your toilet waters or face powders, as it would not be proper to use your hostess' linen for cleaning up such things.

Another thing every guest should remember to take with her is a plentiful supply of her own stationery and postage stamps. Too many guests sit down at their hostess' writing desk and make free with her stationery and stamps. This is exceedingly bad form. A woman's stationery is generally a personal matter which she buys to suit herself, and, of course, you know that postage stamps are the same as money.

If there are servants in the house where you are visiting, never embarrass your host or hostess by tipping them freely on every occasion. You are not in a hotel and you should take it for granted that your friends pay their servants a sufficient wage. At the end of your visit, however, it is all right to remember each servant, or at least such servants as you come in daily contact with, like the parlor maid, butler, chauffeur, etc., etc. Leave either a little present or a small sum of money for them when you go.

You may be visiting in a city or town where you have other acquaintances of whom you are exceedingly fond, but while you are the guest of one friend you should do no more than pay a call on your other friends. Never by any means stay over night with them and above all do not invite them to dinner with you.

No matter how careless you may be in your own home in regard to leaving your things about, it is quite a different thing when you are visiting. At your own home you may have a maid who will pick up the magazine you left on the couch or the kimono you left in the middle of your sleeping-room, but when visiting take care of these things yourself. Do not leave your wraps lying about the house, nor your books or other personal belongings scattered here and there. You may leave your embroidery on the veranda, a magazine on the lawn and other things scattered about. This means so much extra work for your friend or her servant.

There is another habit many guests have, if they are accustomed to go about visiting now and then, and it is a grievously bad habit—and that is telling your host and hostess what a beautiful place "so and so" has. Do not say that Mr. Smith has a wonderful garden, or the drawing-room in Mrs. Jones's home is perfectly exquisite. In fact, o not comment at all upon the homes and belongings of other friends other than to say that they seem to be quite happy and comfortable for such expiation upon the homes of others is likely to make your hostess feel as though you were drawing comparisons in which her own home by no means took the lead.

Be ten times as careful of your hostess' belongings as you would of your own. If you come back dusty from an automobile ride do not rush indoors and wipe the dust from your face with your friend's best monogramed linen. Take a face cloth or a cheaper towel for this. Never brush he dust from your shoes with your friend's towels. This seems absurd advice but it is frequently done.

The servants of your hostess are employed by her to do her bidding. When she requests them to attend to you, that is quite right, but under no consideration should you order her servants about.

Before you have been in the home of your friend more than two days you will get an idea of when they have their meals. Always be on time. By all means get down to breakfast with your host and hostess. If you have ever entertained friedds you know how disagreeable it is to have to wait for breakfast. Perhaps your husband is in a hurry to get away, and you expect to get up any minute for your guests. Remember this, and always be prompt at meal time.

If there are children where you are visiting never make the grave error of telling how perfectly well trained your sister's or cousin's or other friend's child is. No matter how incorrigible your hostess' children may be or how much like angels they are, any comment upon the good qualities of other people's children is decidedly out of place and impolite.

If you go to the theater or some other place and come back late at night do not enter the house noisily, chattering and laughing for there are other people in the household who have rights and should not be disturbed. You would not do this in your own home, nor should you do it when visiting.

There are women who go visiting and buy little things for their hostess' table such as fruits, and other dainties. This is the height of impoliteness and is really an insult as it is an intimation that you are not getting sufficient foods either in quantity or quality.

Do not give pennies or any money to the children. If you want them to have a little present consult their mother as to what to get them. If you want to give them money give it to their mother for them. The chances are their mother doesn't want them to spend money and she may be greatly disturbed if the children are given a little change with which they may buy the oft-times unwholesome penny candy.

Never appear uneasy while visiting. Do not stroll to the windows or doors and look out longingly, giving the impression that you are getting deadly dull and feel as though you were imprisoned. Do not say, "Oh, dear, I wonder what I will do today."

If the guest will remember all these things, she will find that wherever she has visited she will be doubly welcome next time and that year after year she will be fairly deluged with invitations from her friends begging her to make them a visit.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

flower itself is white and waxy and from six to ten inches in diameter, shaped like a wild rose.

Three crops of vegetables a year are raised.

Grapes ripen in September. We have the large, thick-skinned grapes, black and white. Apples grow only in the extreme north and cherries are scarcely known. We have pears and peaches but very few plums as winter fruits are specialized in, such as oranges, and grapefruit which begins to ripen in October. Then there are bananas, kumquats, mangoes, avacado pears, guavas, lemons, tangerines, tangeloes, etc.

The kumquats are a small citrus fruit, pear shaped with a skin like an orange. The skin is sweeter than the flesh and is eaten along with the rest of it. Tangerines are similar to oranges but are not as round. They are easily peeled and plugs easily separated. More highly flavored than an orange. Tangeloes are a new fruit, a cross between grapefruit and tangerines, smooth skinned and very delicious. The avacado is not a pear at all but an oval shaped, green skinned, oily tasting fruit from three to six inches long and about half as wide, containing a large seed. Guavas are small and round and one has to learn to like the taste. They make fine jelly and paste.

Florida is noted for its scenery, waterways and lakes. Jacksonville is located on the St. John's River which is very wide and winding. It and the Amazon are the only two bodies of water in the world flowing northward. There are a number of sawmills located along the river and pine and cypress trees are chiefly used for lumber. Our woods are mostly pine and the land is quite flat with only an occasional knoll. There are some hills, of course, but the land in general is flat. There are other woods composed of several varieties of oak trees, all different from the northern oak. Some of these are the live oak which grows to be very large, black-jack oaks and water oaks. The Spanish moss hanging from these trees is very pretty and picturesque though gruesome at night. It is used as packing material and for mattress stuffing and upholstering purposes when dried. Other Florida trees besides those already mentioned are sycamore, camphor, wasberry, soapberry, pecan, hickory, palm, cedar, wild cherry, wild olive, wild plum, chinaberry, sweet gum, chaparell, white, pink, cerise and purple flowering myrtle, Confederate Rose, ash, holly and umbrella trees.

There are not many factories or mills, some have asked me concerning these. Day laborers here are mostly colored. When the city or country has road work to be done, convicts from the state prison farm are put to work. White men who have a trade usually find work to do, and one can always make a good living on a small chicken or truck farm. Land is very reasonable and a great deal of it can be had for ten dollars per acre. The fishing industry is good. Conditions are good for cattle and hog raising. White women here never hire out as servants excepting as housekeepers.

Schools are very good in Jacksonville and I think they must be equally as good throughout the state.

I have not yet mailed my collection of library views to my home town library which happens to be in Kansas, but probably will have by the time this is published, provided it is. The states represented in my collection are, Ohio, Indiana, California, each 13 cities, Illinois, 12 cities, Wisconsin, ten cities, New York, eleven, Michigan, nine, Iowa and Pennsylvania each seven, Okla., Conn., Kentucky, Oregon, Alabama, No. Carolina, Maine, R. I., New Jersey, Kansas, Missouri, Washington, Vermont, Tenn., New Hampshire, Minn., and Massachusetts are represented by cards from two to six cities. Arizona, Miss., Colo., Maryland, Wyo-So. Dak. and La. by one city each. Would like to have library views from any state not mentioned and anyone in states mentioned who would like to send a card, will find they are very acceptable to me as I cannot have too many cities represented.

Love to all.

The Vision

Sought by the souls of Mortals
Found by a few that seek Lost by the strong at the Portals
Gained by the prayer of the weak.

It dwells in the stroke of the Artist's brush
It burns in the Poet's pen
It glows in the sunset's crimson blush
'Tis found in the heart of a Friend.

It led the hosts of Joan, The Maid,
It dawned in Galahad's Soul
It breathed with the Glory that time shall not fade
In the touch of Angelo.

It gives our Flag its Glory
Though battered or bruised or torn
It shone round the face of the Christ Child
On that first Sweet Christmas Morn.

Arthur of Avalon saw the light
That shone in the Holy Grail
Columbus too had the vision bright
In his ships so small and frail.

When the souls of Men are sifted
And to End is but to Begin
The veil shall then be lifted
And the Chosen pass within.

"Royal Dainties"

Gen. 49:20.

Happy indeed are the people of God,
Saved by His mercy, made near by Christ's blood,
Clothed in His merits, accepted for aye,—
Never, no never, will God cast away.

Bread for their bodies, and bread for their soul,
He will provide, since possessing the whole;
Nothing shall fail them, God's saints shall be kept,
Never, no never, their Keeper hath slept.

Royal the dainties, which He will supply,
In the King's chambers we now are brought nigh,
Heavenly blessings are evermore known,
Never, no never, the Lord will disown.

Royal the banquet, then grateful, by grace,
How we should thank Him, and praise have its place;
Boasting and fearing and scheming are wrong,
Never, no never, should cease our glad song.

Pilgrims on earth, we are rested "in Him,"
Nor should our prospect of glory grow dim;
Now in God's family, and welcomed above,
Never, no never, will God change His love!

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Fitting Piston Rings

THE installation of new piston rings is an operation requiring skill. Many repairmen do not properly install rings and therefore do not obtain the results which the owner expects. The first point to consider is the condition of the cylinders. If they are scratched or out of round, the installation of new rings on the pistons will not improve the engine operation. The only remedy is to have the cylinders reground and fitted with oversize pistons and rings.

However, assuming that the cylinders are in good condition, remove the pistons and number each one so that it can be readily identified and replaced in the proper cylinder. For example, a mark with a center punch in the piston head will indicate that this piston belongs in No. 1 cylinder. Two marks will show that the piston was removed from No. 2 cylinder, etc. After numbering the pistons, the first operation is to wash each piston in gasolene. Make sure that all foreign matter is removed from the ring grooves. Pick up a new ring and try it in the groove of a piston as shown in Fig. 1. Roll the ring around the groove until you have determined that there are no binding points. Should the ring bind in one groove, try this ring in another groove. When you have determined that the ring is a good fit in the groove, place a tag on the ring to indicate the piston and groove. For example, should you find that the ring fits the lower groove of No. 1 piston, write on the tag that you will attach to this ring, "Lower groove, No. 1 piston." This wording may be changed as the workman sees fit but the idea is to mark the ring so that it can be identified. Let us now consider that we have a ring that will not fit any groove and must be fitted. One method is to obtain a sheet of very fine emery cloth and fasten it to a level surface. Smear a little oil over the emery surface. Next place the ring on the emery cloth and place a small block of wood on top of the ring as shown in Fig. 2. With this block of wood move the ring over the emery cloth. First take a little off one side of the ring and then turn ring over and grind a trifle off the other side. Do not use much pressure in the grinding operation as in all probability but little grinding will be necessary to obtain a fit. Be sure to wash the ring thoroughly in gasolene before trying the fit in the piston groove.

FITTING PISTON RINGS.

We will now consider that we have arrived at the point where we know that the rings are a proper fit in the piston grooves.

Our next operation is to fit the rings to the piston bores. Fig. 3 shows a piston ring compressed and entered in the cylinder bore. If the ring was fitted to a piston removed from No. 1 cylinder, it will of course be tried in the bore of No. 1 cylinder. When in the position shown in Fig. 3 there should be a space of approximately .010 inch between the ends of the ring. Manufacturers give varying figures for the proper distance between the ends of the ring but in absence of the proper figure .010 inch is not a bad medium. The distance between the ends is determined by a gauge commonly termed a feeler. Obtain a feeler of .010 inch thickness and try it in the slot. If it will not enter the slot then the ring should be removed and placed in a vise as shown in Fig. 4. A very fine file should be used to obtain the proper clearance. After making sure that the rings are a proper fit in the grooves and cylinder bores, the rings are now ready to be placed in their proper grooves on the piston.

Rings are made of cast iron and they will not stand too much stretching without breaking. Extreme care, therefore, must be exercised in this operation. The bottom ring should be fitted first. Procure an old hack saw blade and grind off the teeth. Next break it into three pieces. Place the pieces on the piston, as shown in Fig. 5, and slide the bottom ring down the piston into its groove. Next slide the middle ring in place and remove the pieces of hack saw. The top ring can be stretched over the top of the piston and pushed into its groove.

If a proper fitting job has been done the rings will slide easily around their grooves but there will be no up-and-down play.

Some pistons are made with pins in the grooves to prevent turning of the rings. When such is the case the rings must be turned until they are fastened on the pins. If no means for preventing the rings from turning is provided then care must be taken to prevent the slots of the different rings from registering with one another. Having decided on the location of the slot for the top ring, the middle ring should be turned until its slot is one-third of a turn away from the top ring slot. Now move the lower ring until its slot is one-third of a turn away from that of the second ring slot. The replacing of the piston, equipped with rings, into the cylinder bore is a two-man job unless a ring compressor is at hand. One person should hold the piston at the entrance of the cylinder bore while the other person should compress the rings with his fingers so that they will enter. Compress the first ring until it enters the bore, then the second ring, etc.

If the piston enters the bore from the bottom do not push it too far into the cylinder as there is danger of the top ring leaving the cylinder bore and expanding in the combustion chamber. Unless the engine has a removable head, about the only way a ring in this position can be freed is to break the ring.

A short time ago I received an inquiry from a reader relative to the amount of clearance that a piston ring should have. I replied that pistons have clearance but rings should fit the cylinder tightly so that compression could be held. I have since wondered whether this reader referred to the piston ring groove. If he had reference to the groove then my reply was not complete. When the ring is fitted to the cylinder bore there should be clearance between the ends of the ring. Manufacturers differ as to the amount of clearance but about .010 inch is a good medium.

Lubrication Necessary

Before fitting a piston equipped with rings into the cylinder, it is first necessary to thoroughly oil the cylinder bore and piston. Carefully wipe the cylinder bore clean, after which make sure that your hands are clean and free from grit. Pour clean cylinder oil on your hand and then rub the lubricant around the cylinder bore. Make sure that the entire cylinder bore is well oiled. Next squirt clean cylinder oil on the piston and around the rings. The piston and rings are then ready to enter the cylinder.

Traffic Signals

Instead of traffic signals bearing the words "GO" and "STOP," most of the larger cities are endeavoring to control traffic with colored lights. Usually this system uses three lights of different colors as signals. Should a green light be cast in your direction it indicates that you are to go as cross traffic has been stopped. When the red light is cast in your direction it indicates that you are to stop as the cross traffic has been given the right of way. When the orange light is shown it indicates that a change of signal is about to take place. For example, should the red light be against you and a change is made to an orange light, you should get your first gear engaged and otherwise prepare the car to start as the signal will very soon be turned to the green light and the course will be clear for you to proceed.

Freeing Exhaust Valve

A stuck exhaust valve is one of the common causes for irregular engine operation. The valve sticks due to the guide having become coated with thickened oil. One method of freeing a stuck valve is to squirt kerosene on the stem then pry the valve up as far as possible and allow it to snap back. If a relief cock is located above the exhaust valve, turn the motor over until the tappet raises this valve to its highest point. Kerosene squirted through the relief cock will then strike the valve head and run on the stem. Wait a few minutes and repeat the application of kerosene. Turn the engine over until the tappet lowers and if the spring does not close the valve try snapping in method above described.

Adjusting Bearings

Main and connecting rod bearings are usually fitted with laminated shims, each lamination of which is approximately .003 inch thick. Each bearing should be properly adjusted before passing on to another bearing. One lamination should be removed from the shims and the bearing screwed down tightly. Turn the engine over with the hand crank and if it turns freely loosen the bearing and remove another lamination from the shims. Continue this process until the bearing freezes or, in other words, seizes the crankshaft. Now loosen the bearing and replace the last lamination that was taken out. This will give the bearing about .003 inch looseness which is a necessary clearance to provide an oil film. Adjust each bearing in like manner.

Condensation

If gasolene drains from the carburetor immediately after the engine is stopped it is not a conclusive sign that the carburetor is leaking. If the draining stops in a short time, the indication is that the condition is due to the vapor that remains in the manifolds having condensed and run down and out of the carburetor. It is a natural condition and requires no remedy.

Body Squeaks

After you have tightened all the body bolts and find that you have not got rid of the body squeaks, try loosening the bolts and squirting a little lubricating oil around each bolt. Be sure to tighten each bolt after oiling.

Adjusting Spring Shackles

When adjusting spring shackles draw up the bolt or nut until it is tight. Next back out the bolt or nut about a quarter of a turn, after which the adjustment should be considered as properly made. The bolt or nut should never be tightly drawn up as this condition causes the spring eye to be held rigid. The spring eye must be free to turn on the bolt as otherwise there is danger of breaking off the end of the spring. Usually provision is made for anchoring the bolt or nut and after making the adjustment this feature must not be overlooked.

Answers to Correspondents

BABBITTING.—My car is a 1914 model Oldsmobile. Please tell me how to babbitt the connecting rods and main bearings. Could I make my own jig for that purpose, or where can I get information concerning that matter? M. M., Springvalley, Ill.

A.—While I could go to great length regarding the subject of babbitting, my advice is that you have the work done by someone who is equipped to handle work of this nature. Most manufacturers have an exchange price on rebabbitted connecting rods which would not make it worth your while to bother with the job. The babbitting of a crankcase is work which should be handled by an experienced man. I am sure you will be money ahead and have a much better job if you will follow my suggestion.

ENGINE STALLS.—I have a 1920, model 15, Dort touring car. When I engage the clutch in low gear with sufficient acceleration it will stall the engine. Sometimes in such case the engine stalls momentarily and then starts firing again and gives the car a jerk. Can the cause of this trouble be in the carburetor or in the clutch? MRS. E. H., De Soto, Mo.

A.—From the description you have furnished I am inclined to believe that your trouble is experienced when the motor is cold. Unless the carburetor is choked when first starting out, the motor is apt to stall. Allow the motor to warm up for two or three minutes before starting out. If, however, the clutch grabs suddenly when engaged, the leather may need softening with neat's-foot oil or the springs adjusted.

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield.

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, make chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for raisers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientifically prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do—to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by this guarantee.

The Sitting Hen and the Cause of Chicks Dying in the Shell

THOUGH I am a strong advocate of artificial incubation, Biddy takes preference for rearing future stock, and for hatching small numbers of ducks, geese or turkey eggs.

Do not think that Biddy must be allowed to remain in the nest she claims in the chicken-house, for such an arrangement always breeds trouble; every hen will desire to lay in that particular nest, even if there are twenty others vacant. Then, if Mrs. Biddy is of a pugilistic disposition, there are fights and broken eggs. If she be of the angelic type, and allows intruders to crowd into her nest, she gathers the eggs to her motherly breast, and the warmth soon renders them unfit for table use.

To avoid all trouble of this kind, devote some small building to the exclusive use of sitting hens, where they will be free from all disturbing influences. Arrange nest boxes, with hay in them, all around the sides. In the center of the floor two boxes filled with fine ashes for the sitters to bathe in are needed, as well as a drinking fountain and a pan filled with whole corn mixed with sharp grit—four portions of the former to one of the latter. Fill up the pan and water fountain every morning. Cut a large turnip or cabbage in half and fix it between stones, so as to keep the cut side firmly uppermost; then whenever hunger assails any of the occupants of the house, they can eat and return to their nests without attention from you.

GUARDING THE NEWLY HATCHED CHICKS WITH MOTHERLY PRIDE.

Droppings must of course be removed every day, and the ash baths emptied and refilled twice a week.

There is also another time and trouble saving device: we now use a sort of cage three feet long, two feet wide and one and a half high, made of shingle slats covered around the sides, ends and top with two-inch mesh netting, which is placed over the nest when the hen is first set, if she seems at all restless. Some hens always have to have the cage kept over them, or after feeding they go into the wrong nest, leaving their own. Obviously, when the cage is used, food, water and all the needs must be placed inside.

When you see the same hen on the nest each time you go into the coop, it is a sign she is getting broody. If she is still there when you lock up for the night, she is ready to be set.

Being sure of a broody hen, go into the house when it is almost dark, stoop down in front of the nest, and place your hands over Biddy, the thumbs meeting between the shoulders, the fingers passing over the body and picking up the feet. In this way she is easily removed without any fright being caused to the other inmates of the house. Carry her outside, then hold by the feet, head down, and proceed to dust her feathers thoroughly with insect powder from the dredge. When it has been well rubbed in, gather her up in your hands in the same position as when you took her from the nest, and hold her until she is quiet again. Then place her over the nest and free your fingers from her claws, letting her feel the eggs, releasing her gradually as you feel her settle down on the nest.

All this handling must be accomplished as nearly as possible in the dark, and as it is not always convenient to do it during the short time of dusk, a lantern must be fixed up for night work; paint all but a strip of the glass with black paint.

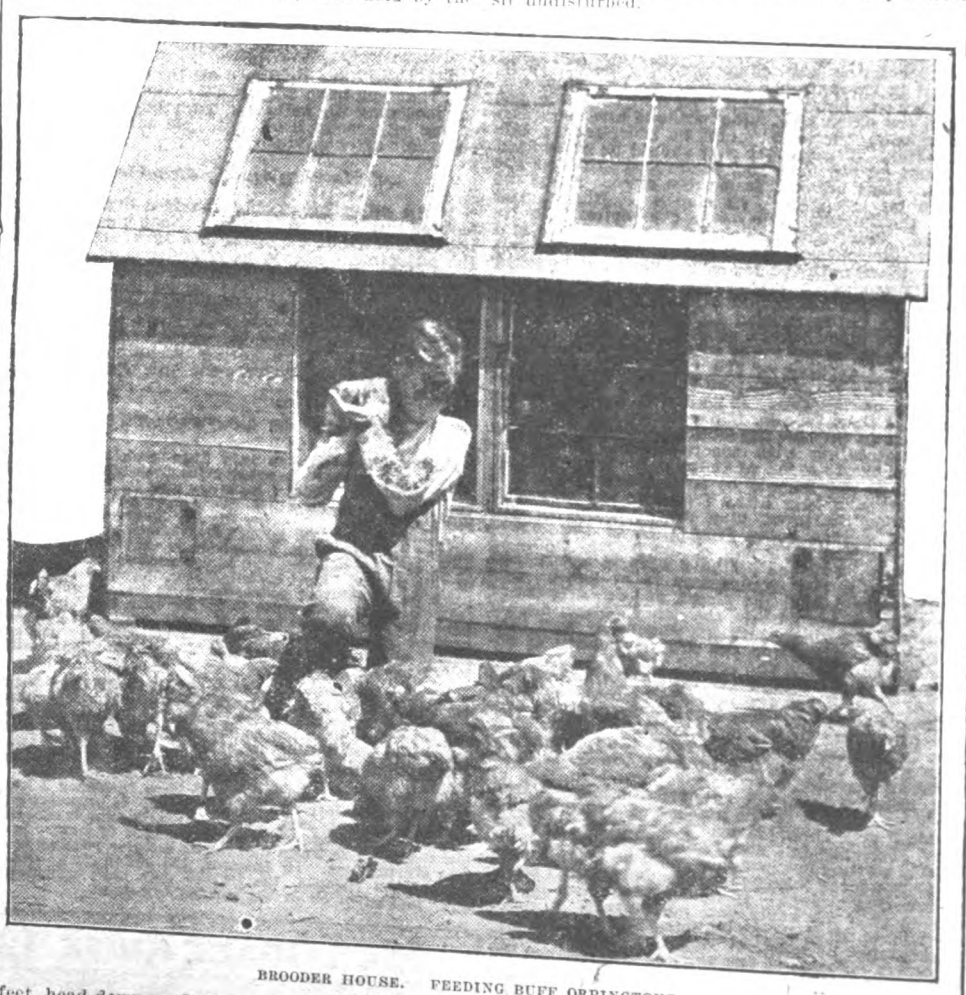
As the moving and powdering are likely to make the hen restless, three or four china nest eggs are put into the nest at first; then, when she has settled down to business, it is an easy matter the next evening to change and slip real eggs under her. The ordinary sitting of hens' eggs is thirteen in number, but a large hen can safely be given fifteen, especially as the weather becomes warmer.

About the seventh and fifteenth days after the sitting has begun, the hen should again be powdered.

Always try and set two or more hens at the same time. You can then give the two clutches to one hen, returning the other hen to the chicken-house, where she will soon begin laying again.

When Biddy has been sitting twenty-one full days, listen; if you hear a twitter in the morning, wait for the evening before slipping your hand under her to remove the dry chicks. If it is evening before you hear any sound, wait until the next morning.

The object in removing the young ones is that the hen, in moving around to help the later chickens out of the shell, may not be able to avoid trampling on and injuring those already out. At the same time clear the nest of broken shells, for there is danger that a broken section may get fitted over a pipped egg, thus excluding the air and smothering the occupant.



The newcomers must be wrapped in flannel, put in a blanket, and kept warm behind the kitchen stove. Wait twelve hours longer; then take all the chicks, remove the hen to her future home, fasten her in, and give her a good feed of corn. Place before the coop a run three feet long, made of slats and half-inch wire netting or boards a foot high so the little ones cannot wander away and get lost.

Coops are best kept in the full sun until the middle of April. After that, place them under a tree for shelter and shade. All grass under and around them should be cut short, so that dew and rain will dry off as quickly as possible and make it easier for the chicks to eat. Each family should be six feet away from all the others, for some hens will wreak dire vengeance on any baby that is foolish enough to mistake home and mother.

What Causes Chicks to Die in the Shell?

Chicks dying in the shell is one of the most discouraging troubles the amateur chicken man has to face, and apparently the one which mystifies him most. Yet there are several causes for even the strongest chicks dying in the shell.

First, we will take the case of eggs set under hens. It often happens that hens will sit well until the last twenty-four hours, then get nervous and fidgety. Sometimes Biddy gets hungry or thirsty and leaves the nest. This is often the case when hens are allowed to set in the chicken-house or steal their nests around the farm buildings. But if no one happens to notice them when they come off to feed, they may go back to their nests with only a half-filled crop on the nineteenth or twentieth day, which will force them to leave the nest again before the hatch is completed. As the warm weather advances in the spring, vermin may worry a hen into leaving her nest. Rats often scare a hen into leaving the nest when she is sitting outside, or another hen may fight her while trying to claim the nest to lay in. In fact, there are, of course, numerous accidental causes for the hens getting off the nest in the last forty-eight hours, when they should sit undisturbed.

BROODER HOUSE. FEEDING BUFF ORPINGTONS.

Perhaps the most frequent cause of chicks dying in the shell when eggs are set under hens, is the owner's anxiety to help things along. During the last thirty-six hours, it is imperative that all the warmth and moisture generated by the developing chicks and the body of the hen should be retained in the nest, and if someone is perpetually lifting the hen partly from the eggs to take away hatched chicks or to see what is happening, much of the moisture is allowed to escape, and the last two or three eggs fail to hatch, though they often contain fully developed chicks. An extremely dry season generally brings lots of complaints about chicks dying in the shell. The best way to combat adverse conditions is to remove broody hens from the chicken-house, and set them in clean nests in a house or shed which can be closed so that a quantity of whole corn and clean water can be left in readiness for Biddy to feed herself with when she comes off of the nest. It is also well to put a shallow box of fine coal ashes in the house where the hens are sitting, so that they can dust themselves every time they leave the nest. If it is a dry season, sprinkle water on the floor of the house every two or three days. When it comes to hatching time, listen, and if you hear any peeping in the morning, restrain your curiosity until late in the evening, then carefully slip your hand under the hen and remove as many dry chicks and broken egg shells as you can find easily and in a short space

March: The Get-Ready Month

WHEN the roads are hub deep with mud and the land is too soft to drive a wagon on, though we humans are impatient to start the spring's work and cannot brook delays, we cannot control the weather and must make the most of conditions as we find them. For those who make the most of their time, March offers a real opportunity to do up a lot of odd jobs before it is too late—jobs that will remain undone throughout the year unless they are done now. They are to be found on every farm if we only look for them. To mention them all would not be possible in the space at our disposal, but we take space for the commonest or most important.

Soon there will be early spring pigs and lambs to care for. Are we ready for their arrival? Is the lambing pen clean and disinfected and whitewashed? Has the farrowing pen been cleaned out with scalding water, then disinfected or whitewashed, since it was last used as a nursery? Perhaps there are colony houses to repair, or new ones to build. If so, how is the time to play carpenter.

Has due thought been given to the ewes, sows, cows or mares that are soon to "do their bit" toward increasing the census of your farm's livestock? Ewes need plenty exercise, fresh air, sunlight and succulent feed such as chopped turnips to insure healthy strong lambs. The same holds true for sows in a measure, as successful hog raisers all know. Though many swine raisers believe that selling time is the real "hog raisers' harvest," the truth of the matter is that farrowing time tells the tale; the farmer who loses pigs at this time starts under a handicap, and no matter how well he feeds he cannot really overcome his losses incurred right at the start. But we have mentioned all these points before, and repeat only because we are so thoroughly interested.

Hotbeds, too, have been dealt with in these columns. Moreover, the agricultural experiment stations in each state have bulletins devoted to this subject that may be obtained free upon request. Perhaps a gentle reminder that spring spraying time will soon be here is in order. Why not stock up with the necessary materials such as copper sulphate (bluestone), quicklime, arsenate of lead, etc., on the next trip to town? It may save a special trip later on. Then look over the spraying outfit to see that the barrel does not leak, that the pump works as it should, and that the nozzles are not corroded. Nothing is such a nuisance as a nozzle that does not work as it should, and most orchardists who have blessed a corroded nozzle will put their O. K. on our statement.

While we think of it, don't forget to get a new rooster or two. Get fowls of good breeding, even if they do cost a little more. They will far more than pay for themselves in a single season. Furthermore, get them right away. To delay will make the hatching qualities of the early spring eggs a matter of doubt, and it is these eggs that should be kept for setting. "Do it now!" is old but good advice.

When and How to Prune

"Prune any time your knife is sharp" is the customary practice in large commercial orchards. Here it is necessary to prune every day when the weather permits from November to April in order to accomplish the job before spraying commences. But in smaller farm orchards where the owner is at liberty to choose the best time for this work, March or early April pruning has been found most satisfactory, for wounds made at this time start to heal almost immediately.

The manner in which the job is done is more important than the time, however. Better do it when the opportunity presents than fail to do it at all—a common oversight that is borne out in the presence of so many water sprouts in orchards everywhere.

Give all orchard trees a thorough examination this month. If trees have been planted too close together, mark or "blaze" the poorest ones for removal; then, when time permits, chop them out to give light and room to good trees that have been prevented from bearing heavily in their former crowded condition. Also cut out all trees that are found to be badly diseased or that have been damaged beyond repair by winter storms. To advise that all diseased trees or limbs be promptly burned may seem unnecessary; still there are orchards where the "slashings" are allowed to remain on the ground to continue as a menace to healthy trees.

There are really three aims to be kept in mind in all pruning. First, strive to get good light and ventilation to all parts of every bearing tree. Second, keep each tree reasonably low, the height of course depending in a measure on the variety habit of growth. Third, keep trees in fruiting condition by removing water sprouts and all diseased portions.

Putting a neglected bearing tree, that has never before been pruned, into good condition usually takes more than one year, for if such a tree is severely pruned the first season a dense growth of slender whiplike water sprouts is almost certain to result. Therefore the reclamation of a long neglected tree should be spread over two or three years. In the first pruning cut out all dead wood; remove all stubs or diseased branches; cut off all water sprouts except those which are left to grow and replace limbs lost through disease or injury; cut off or remove, as the case may be, all interfering branches unless these are so numerous that the work must be distributed over a period of two years; if the tree is tall or if the growth tendency is upright, cut back top growth to stimulate the development of side branches (laterals).

Spring Bee Management

The time when bees should be taken out in the spring is generally based upon the blooming of the willows. Naturally this time varies from early March in the South to mid April in the North. Few if any bee-keepers find that it is safe to remove bees as soon as the snow disappears. If the bees are given no outside protection the time of their removal from the cellar should be governed largely by their condition. If they are not restless nor suffering from dysentery they should be kept in the cellar until early April in the North, unless the weather is warm enough for them to fly and be continuously active. If bees are protected by a windbreak and outside covers they may be taken out late in March with safety.

Observation covering many years shows that it is not best to take them out while the ground is covered with snow. Usually late March has a warm spell that could be taken advantage of to permit bees to have a "cleansing flight." If hives are short of stores they should be set out during the March warm spell and given an abundance of sugar syrup to carry them over until field blossoms will supply their need.

Some bee-keepers make a practice of placing tarred paper, or preferably roofing paper, covers over their hives in the early spring. Extensive experiments conducted at the Wisconsin Experiment Station show, however, that such covers do little if any good unless they are so made and fitted that they completely cover the hive and are tightly fixed all around the bottom.

Grow Wilt-Resistant Tomatoes

Tomato wilt causes an annual loss of more than 115,000 tons of tomatoes in the United States, but by planting the new wilt-resistant varieties this loss can be entirely overcome. Three varieties of tomatoes developed by Fred J. Pritchard, plant physiologist in charge of truck crop disease investigations for the United States Department of Agriculture, and another variety developed by the same investigator working cooperatively with J. B. S. Norton, place within the reach of tomato growers four varieties that are highly resistant to the disease. On land that is so heavily infected with wilt that ordinary tomatoes will not grow upon it, these new resistant strains are now producing heavy crops of excellent fruit. They are selections from three of the best known commercial varieties of tomatoes grown, the Greater Baltimore, Stone, and Merveille des Marches (Marvel of the Market), and they possess, in addition to wilt resistance, all the good qualities of their parent varieties. Moreover, extensive field tests have shown them to be well adapted to all parts of the United States in which tomato wilt is present, thus placing them within the reach of growers everywhere.

Very few of the better known commercial varieties already on the market possess any great degree of resistance to wilt. The Duke of York and the Buckeye State, apparently one variety under two names, are highly resistant, but the quality of fruit produced is not of the best. Livingston's Globe is somewhat resistant, but its purplish fruit does not meet with the approval of canners and is also discriminated against for the same reason in many markets. In the South, where this variety is most extensively grown, it is very susceptible to nail-head rust very prevalent there. Apparently there is a grave need throughout tomato growing regions for the four new wilt-resistant varieties already discussed.

Ten Rules for Raising Chicks

"It is the first week or two of a chick's life that really count," we are told again and again by experienced poultrymen. Of course the chick has a long road to travel from the time it is hatched until it becomes either a broiler or a good laying pullet, but if it gets by the first few weeks of its young life it is then well started and its chances of thriving improve daily.

Here are ten rules which every poultry raiser can well afford to practice:

1. Use healthy, active and, if possible, free range breeding stock.
2. Have hovers warm enough, so chicks will not crowd underneath. A cold hover is dangerous.
3. Give milk or buttermilk to drink right from the start. For the first ten days feed at least five times daily, but feed only a small amount each time.
4. Keep chicks busy and do not feed enough scratch feed to fill their crops more than one-third full except the last feeding at night. (This is very important, though it is commonly overlooked, and dead or "peepless" chicks are the result).
5. Do not have any drafts where chicks sleep.
6. Watch chicks closely at bedtime to see that they do not crowd or get packed into corners.
7. No matter how cold, get chicks out of doors as soon as possible, but see that they can run to the hover whenever they desire.
8. Commence feeding green feed when chicks are about a week old, preferably having them run on green clover.
9. Keep close watch for mites. If they are not controlled, no chicks will be raised.
10. Give more room and more air as chicks grow larger. Don't crowd.

The Right Calf to Raise

Many farmers and some dairymen too, for that matter, still cling to the old-fashioned method that one calf is just about as good as another—that "calves is calves." Of course many now recognize the value of good breeding, choosing their heifer calves from dams of high and persistent production. But breeding alone should not be depended upon in the selection of calves that are to be raised and kept to form the herd of the future. The appearance and "typiness" of the calf itself must be taken into consideration, for even at a very early age there are certain "earmarks" of desirability by which we may judge or estimate the value of the cow in the making. Often old stockmen call a calf of the right sort "a likely lookin' critter"; few of them could tell the points upon which they base their judgment. But there are well-recognized points, nevertheless, known to our most successful dairymen, dairy judges and dairy experts at the various agricultural experiment stations. We sum them up briefly for those who may have an opportunity to buy good calves cheap, or who may wish to pick out their best calves and sell the remainder for veal.

First study the calf's head; it will tell you much about the breeding, quality and future value of the animal. The eyes should be large, bright, clear and indicate good health. Face should be medium length and free from fleshiness—what old dairymen call a "sweet face." Large, well-dilated nostrils, are desirable, as they permit free and ample breathing. A large, broad muzzle, combined with strong jaw, points to the good and economical feeder.

Now stand out in front of the calf and give it a more general "once over." Avoid a calf that stands, on several repeated tests, with its front legs close together. This indicates poor constitution. The calf that stands with its good sturdy, straight legs set well apart is the kind to pick out, for this posture indicates a roomy and wide chest well started in the making. Good lungs are absolutely necessary for strong constitution.

Next move around to the side of the calf. Look for a neck that is neat, slim and of medium length. A short, thick neck is a strong indication of beef type. In a dairy cow this usually is shown as the animal grows older in a tendency to "put fat on its ribs instead of milk into the pail." Economical, high and persistent milk production in a mature cow is seldom combined with the beefy type with a thick and heavy neck and a well-fleshed body. The best milkers tend toward thinness, and this holds true in the calf in a measure, though we do not wish to imply that a calf should not be plump and healthy looking. It should. Time enough to show its ribs when it begins to milk; until then plumpness proves that it is receiving more than enough feed to produce normal growth. The neck should blend neatly into the shoulder, and the shoulder itself should be spare of flesh coming to a distinct crest or ridge at the withers.

Look for a good straight top line from shoulder to tail head. The calf with a sagging back will grow into a "sway-backed" cow. Length of back is also important; a long loin indicating ample carrying capacity. Well sprung ribs combine with the long back to make room for the House Cleaning, Renovating, and Improved Conveniences

the breadths together, turn a two-inch hem at the edges and sew flat. Turn wrong-side up, dampen, stretch and tack to a bare floor. When dry, apply two coats of first-class varnish, allowing several days between coats.

When rugs or art squares curl at the sides it is usually because they are stretched. To remedy this, take carpet thread or warp, and make parallel runs quite close together for about one edge back from the edge. The thread is drawn just tight enough to overcome the stretching, and the stitches will not show above the nap.

Strips of mattings sewed together also make good rugs but they require an occasional tack to hold them in place. Matting carpets are not satisfactory as they sift dust and acquire a musty odor in damp weather or if the room is closed.

A good crack filler can be made at home if you can obtain sawdust from a sawmill. To make, have the sawdust absolutely dry, and mix all you can into hot glue. Fill cracks at once. Smooth and paint the floor.

Drawer with Tray for Silver

Any drawer can be made to do double duty by building in one or more trays, according to the depth of the drawer. A glance at the illustration will show a small strip of wood tacked to the side of the drawer, and there is a corresponding one on the opposite side. A shallow tray, just long enough to admit a dinner knife, slides on these two strips. The tray contains different sized spoons, forks and knives. The bottom of drawer is kept free for kitchen utensils such as mixing spoons, cutters, egg beater, rolling-pin, etc.

Air-Dried Dishes

Anyone who has a window over her sink can turn it to great account as indicated in the accompanying illustration. At first thought, air-drying dishes may not seem a practical solution of shortening the hours consumed in dish-washing, but, in fact, it works admirably.

Of course one must have plenty boiling-hot rinse-water. Wash glasses, silver and table dishes. Have a pan of hot water; plunge dishes in and out and set to dry in the rack. The silver will nearly dry at once, but should be finished with a wiper to prevent streaks. The rack is invaluable for drying bottles and glass jars on the inside. It is here that dish-cloths and wipers can be hung, after washing, and dry in the air.

The dryer is very simple to make. Cut two end boards the desired height, and a bottom board to fit between just so the whole will easily slide in and out between the window castings. The bottom board is fastened to the end boards on a slant, according to dotted lines, which serves as a drain board. Two strips are fastened to each side of the dryer, and to these are fastened the upright strips between which the dishes rest while drying. Glasses, cups, bottles and glass jars are slipped over the top ends of the strips. The dryer is fastened to the window frame by means of a long hook and screw-eye.

A Closet That Revolves

It takes but a glance at the illustration of this revolving closet to appreciate what a convenience it may be at one end of a cooking shelf. In small quarters this type of closet is invaluable, as with a slight push the shelf for a particular article swings around and everything can be close at hand without confusion on the cooking board or counters.

It may be made any size required. Cut as many as your particular use will demand and bore a hole through the center of each to admit the wooden or metal rod which is made stationary at the ceiling and beneath the bottom disk or shelf. The partitions form compartments and hold the shelves in place. When not in use a curtain pulls around on a rod, concealing the contents of the closet and keeping out the dust.

Comfort Cleaning Truck

A platform built on a frame thick enough to take large-sized castors makes one of the best labor- and stepsaving devices I know of. On cleaning, or days of general sweeping and dusting, all the tools and materials may be set on the truck and drawn to wherever needed.

A knee-pad to slip under the knees when it is necessary to get down makes the position more comfortable and not so tiresome. Use the best part of an old enamel table-cover, as it will not absorb dampness and can be wiped. Make the same as a pillow slip, 10 by 15 inches, and lay inside a piece of old carpeting, quilt or rug to the desired thickness.

An apron of black oilcloth after the style of a sewing apron with pockets is of incalculable comfort on sweeping days. Damp and oiled dusters will not hurt it, and one can have at hand a certain brush, a hammer or screwdriver, tacks and hooks just when they are wanted.

Kitchen to Cellar Lift

When you consider that a simple chute containing a set of shelves can be made to do the carrying between kitchen and cellar, it does seem as if every woman is entitled to have one built into her house; that the wearying task of so many daily trips going down and up cellar stairs may be lessened and the loads carried for her by the enclosed lift or dumb-waiter.

Any man who knows anything about barn machinery or lifting devices would have no difficulty in installing this household comfort. Right here a neighborhood plan might be evolved whereby skill, labor and materials might be made cooperative in providing each woman with one of these silent helpers.

With the cellar opening protected by a screen door, food can be put on the lift shelves and lowered into the cellar to keep cool until required. All the milk can be lowered and returned to the kitchen, the canned food can be sent down, besides endless other uses it may be put to.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be, COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

MRS. W. L. McN., Winter Haven, Fla.—There is but a small amount of vacant public land left in the state of Florida, and it is probable that this remainder is not very available for agricultural purposes. There is but one U. S. Land Office in the state, and this is at Gainesville. Address the Register there, R. W. Davis, for further information.

MRS. F. P. P., Ethel, Va.—For the best information regarding the hospitals, etc., which Chicago offers for tuberculosis patients, you should address the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute, 1212, S South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. J. F. Means, Claremore, Okla., wishes to learn how to make a rose jar out of rose petals. Perhaps some COMFORT reader who knows how tender rose leaves can be converted into their own container will write to Mrs. Means direct.

R. K., Milton, Ky.—Write to the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington, D. C., for full information concerning opportunities for enlisted men in the navy today. Many trades schools are maintained by our navy at the various stations, navy yards and naval air stations. A three-year enlistment is necessary to get the full benefit of these courses of training.

MRS. H. P. O., Springfield, S. D.—Write to the Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C., regarding the copyright you wish to secure on your musical composition. Application forms and full particulars will be sent you.

A SUBSCRIBER, Slick, Okla.—The only way for you to try to market your verse is to submit it, with postage enclosed for its return if unavailable, to the various newspapers and periodicals you think might be interested in what you have written.

C. M., Louisville, Ky.—Arkansas vacant public land has been reduced to about two hundred thousand acres. There are U. S. Land Offices which you may address at Little Rock, Camden and Harrison.

MRS. W. H. C., Bergoo, W. Va.—We do not like to disappoint your hopes, but we feel sure your husband's violin is not genuinely old and the handiwork of Stradivarius, the great eighteenth century violin maker. Very few genuine Strads remain in existence after the passage of the years, and these, some thirty odd, we believe, have all been located by the experts. There has been built up a thriving trade in fraudulent "old violins," which have been made to bear various inscriptions ascribing them to old makers of the great craft such as Stradivarius, Stainer, etc. We think your husband's violin is one of these faked instruments. You must remember that not so many violins were made in the old days by workers laboring slowly and lovingly over the fragile instruments. During his lifetime it would have been impossible for Stradivarius to produce as many violins as seem to be located in the hands of COMFORT readers who write to this department concerning inscriptions which their instruments bear.

E. T. L., Virginia.—The northern portions of the states of Maine, Michigan and Minnesota would all offer good trapping territory for the animals you mention. The otter is a rather scarce animal, and hardly to be classed with the plentiful and plentiful raccoon.

L. B. L., Miami, Fla.—Seasons of all sorts are valuable, not particularly because of the material from which the stones is cut, but because of the quality of handiwork and artistry in the cutting. The reason old cameos are more valuable than those of later date is because the ancient craftsmen brought to their work a loving degree of skill in their art which is lacking in our more hasty and machine made days. Only inspection of your cameo by one capable of judging could reveal its actual value and marketability.

C. B. T., Minden Mines, Mo.—You say your father bought, ten years ago, one of the "mineral rods" of the sort which you now wish to obtain, but you do not state how much wealth of gold or treasure was ever discovered by means of the rod. We feel rather sure it was not enough to cover the cost of the mysterious instrument. These so-called "divining rods" are but worthless devices used to extract money, not from the earth, but from the pockets of credulous buyers. There is no instrument discovered which will locate precious ores such as those of gold or silver.

E. P. H., Montrose, Colo.—We are sorry, but COMFORT is unable to undertake any job printing. You should secure estimates for your work from one of your nearby newspaper plants.

W. L., Elmo, Kans.—There are over seven million acres of vacant public land in Colorado, and U. S. Land Offices in the state are located at Del Norte, Denver, Durango, Glenwood Springs, Hugo, Lamar, Leadville, Montrose, Pueblo and Sterling. Wyoming has the enormous expanse of 18,077,760 acres of public land awaiting settlement. The U. S. Land Offices are at Buffalo, Cheyenne, Douglas, Evanston, Lander and Newcastle. Write to any of the above offices for such information as you need.

A. A., Frederic, Wis.—See reply to Mrs. W. H. C., Bergoo, W. Va., in this department.

G. F. E., Miles, Tex.—Write to the National Headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America, 200 Fifth Avenue, New York City, for any information you need regarding starting a troop of Scouts in your community.

MRS. L. C. P., Roseburg, Ore.—The dyeing of furs cannot be successfully accomplished at home. We advise you to have this done by firms who are equipped to obtain satisfactory results.

MRS. A. W. W., Forest Grove, Ore.—It is the rarity of a book, not its age, which makes it valuable to collectors. Your hundred-year old school books would command no premium.

A. M. J., Meridian, Miss.—See reply to C. B. T., Minden Mines, Mo., in this department.

James Gauly, Fortville, R. R. 1, Ind., is in search of the song—a parody—entitled, "I Did Not Raise My Girl to be a Mother." Perhaps some kind COMFORT reader can aid. Write to Mr. Gauly direct.

A. E. W., Joseph's Mills, W. Va.—There are twenty-six, not eleven, states which offer vacant public land to homesteaders. We give you the names of the states holding the best opportunities for settlers, together with the name of the principal U. S. Land Office in each state. You may write to the Register of the Land Offices for further information. Arizona, Phoenix; California, Sacramento; Colorado, Denver; Idaho, Boise; Montana, Helena; Nevada, Carson City; New Mexico, Santa Fe; Oregon, Portland; Utah, Salt Lake City; Washington, Seattle; Wyoming, Cheyenne.

A rainstorm in Arizona uncovered the burial ground of a race of prehistoric giants. One of the skulls found was an inch thick.

Comfort's League of Cousins

How many of you cousins are from Virginia? I am, for one, and have been to the Crabtree Falls—which has seven falls and is beautiful to gaze upon.

I'll return favors the best I can.

Best of love to all. DOROTHY DILLARD.

Dorothy, "we all" would sure like to help you in your great problem, but I'm afraid if you wait until all the thousands of votes are in and counted, that your "medium brown" hair will be reaching down to your dainty arched insteps or high heels. And just suppose after all your waiting and counting you found that the votes came out exactly even! It really would be much better to toss up a cent—and if it did not come up the way you wanted it to, why you could toss it up again and keep tossing. My own confidential guess is that you'll have your hair prettily bobbed before this is in print, because, Dorothy, my dear, you say, "I want to bob my hair," and if you want to, I think you'll do it without waiting to see what we all may think about it. I asked Bill about your problem and he looked gloomily over his glasses and growled: "Let her cut it all off. There'll be less to shampoo." But then you know Bill. His temper has been bobbed for a long time.

As a compromise, Dorothy, I suggest you bob one side and see how you like it. This would be equal to the plan of a certain college professor I once heard about. He had decided to shave off his mustache and had cleanly removed the left half when he commenced to think what his wife might say. So he went to her, razor in hand, and asked, "How does it look, my dear? If you don't like it, I won't take the other half off."

And so if you didn't like the bobbed effect, Dotty, you could leave the other half unbobbed—or else make a clean job of it as Bill nastily suggested: But don't wait for us all. We'll like you with long hair, short hair—or just none at all.

DRUMHELLER, ALTA, CANADA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I have contributed the third verse to that song which Monroe R. Davis of Poplar Bluff, Missouri, wanted so bad. She stands on three legs now: one stuck up in Poplar Bluff, one stuck in your den in Brooklyn, and the third one up in the frozen zone of Canada. So the song should stand for ever and ever. If it is all right print it; if it is all wrong, give it to that Goat. Some of the COMFORT Sisters have got my goat.

As ever, OLD SCISSORBILL,
(A. R. WALKER.)

Well, Old Scissorbill, it was good to hear you gurgle again and know you were not so frozen up and blown away that a little bit of melody could not emerge from your windswept throat. A bunch of cousins and "potes" sent in third verses to complete Cousin Monroe R. Davis's song. Some of the efforts were good—but most of 'em were pretty bad. Bill had to choke a little to get 'em down. Your idea of replacing the powder puff by sandpaper I thought made your verse interesting and also the notion of a girl bulldog stopping cannon balls with her teeth in a thick fog. Your imagination keeps above the freezing point up in Alta, Old Scissorbill. I'm keeping my promise and am writing the chorus so that the completed song will run as follows—I hope Cousin Monroe will be pleased after you and I have done so much work:

The Powder Puff Sailor Girl

(By request of Monroe R. Davis, Poplar Bluff, R. R. 2, Mo.)

She went to a tailor shop and dressed up as a man,
And then unto the sea captain and asked to hire as a hand:
"Your arms they are too slender, your fingers are too small,
Your cheeks they are too rosy to face the cannon balls."

CHORUS.

Oh, sail away! Oh, sail away! Upon the broad blue sea—
There's many a girl that's left behind but there's one girl for me!
And that girl's cheeks are rosy, and that girl's lips are red;
She chucks no bluff with a powder puff,
And a sailor she will wed!

Cried she, "Oh, Mr. Captain, I pray you change your mnd!
My heart it will be broken, if I am left behind;
My arms you may think slender, but they are long and tough,
And if my cheeks are rosy, I'l buy a powder puff."

CHORUS.

Oh, sail away! Oh, sail away! etc.

And then the captain answered: "Oh, you're from Poplar Bluff;
Why, with a piece of sandpaper, we'll make your face look rough.
We'll make those rosy cheeks of yours look like an old bulldog,
So you can stop the cannon balls out of the thickest fog."

CHORUS.

Oh, sail away! Oh, sail away! Upon the broad blue sea—
There's many a girl that's left behind but there's one girl for me!
And that girl's cheeks are rosy, and that girl's lips are red;
She chucks no bluff with a powder puff,
And a sailor she will wed!

WHITEWATER, COLORADO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I have just finished reading the cousins' letters and thought I would write. I live on a ranch forty-five miles from the nearest town. My father is a cattle man. Our ranch is in a canyon called "Unaweep." It is an Indian name meaning "parting of the waters." There are high mountains in all directions. They are pretty in summer but they look awful dreary in winter. I like to ride horseback and help with the cattle.

I go to a country school where there are never any more than ten pupils. I am in the ninth grade and I am fourteen years old. I expect to be a schoolteacher if I ever get sense enough. Not long ago I read a letter from a cousin who wanted to live forty miles from town—if there was such a place. Now I haven't been to town for three years!

I believe I will close. I wish some of the cousins would write to me and I will answer all I can. Billy, I heard Daddy say the other day that he wanted some goats to eat the oak brush out of the pasture—so you come out and eat oak brush and leave my letter alone.

Your new cousin, ESTHER CASTO.

Esther, you seem to live in a sort of Valley of Tears—where the Indians wept so much there was "a parting of the waters," one river going from the right eye and the other from the left, I suppose. I don't wonder it is dreary with you in winter, Esther, with all those frozen tears dripping from the high mountains and even the wind sobbing through the pines on the canyon's sides. I must not write any more about it or I will be crying myself and rusting my old typewriter more than ever.

I like that small and select school of yours, Esther, with the ten pupils for the nine grades. This makes one pupil for each grade and one left over. You see I can do simple division, too. With small classes like this you ought to get lots of what the teachers call "individual attention." When I went to school I remember a boy who sat near me who used to spend most of the session wiggling his ears and chewing slippery elm. This chap used to get so much of the teacher's individual attention (and our teacher was a wiry cuss) that he never was able to remove his geography from the seat of his pants. The poor fellow used to study from mine, wiggling his ears at every isthmus, cape and promontory. He told me his map of Asia was worn so thin that you could not find the Himalayas.

New Flavors in Spring Dishes

part is soft, then slip the tips under the water and boil five minutes longer. Asparagus will usually cook in twenty minutes. Make oven toast, dip into melted butter, lay into a hot serving dish, cover with the asparagus and lay several slices on top. Pour a little melted butter over the asparagus.

STRAWBERRY PATTIES.—Invert gem tins and cover with a good pastry; prick with a fork and bake in a quick oven. Remove from tins, and when cool fill with cutup strawberries, sprinkle with sugar and top with white of egg beaten with powdered sugar to the desired sweetness.

BANANA AND RHUBARB JELLY WITH LETTUCE.—Cut unpeeled rhubarb into inch pieces, grate in a little lemon rind, add a very little water and stew until well separated. Strain. Sweeten. To one pint of hot rhubarb add two tablespoons of granulated gelatin that has previously been soaked in a little cold water. When partly set, stir in one large or two small bananas cut into small pieces. Dish into individual servings and set away to cool. Arrange the jelly on nests of lettuce leaves and decorate the plate with slices of banana.

RHUBARB PIE.—Skin and cut rhubarb in half-inch pieces, cover with boiling water, let stand three minutes and drain. Line deep pie plate with pastry, letting it extend one inch beyond the edge. Fill rounding full with rhubarb. Beat one egg and stir into it one cup of sugar previously mixed with two level tablespoons of flour. Spread this over the rhubarb, cover with a crust that extends just to edge of plate and is well slashed for steam vents. Moisten the edge with cold water and bring the under crust over it. Place in quick oven ten minutes, reduce heat and bake slowly for fifty minutes.

RHUBARB RAISIN PIE.—Use above recipe, only substitute some of the rhubarb for stewed raisins and add the grated rind of about one-third of an orange.

RHUBARB AND ORANGE MARMALADE.—Cut one lemon and one orange into slices, shredding the peel as fine as possible. Add four pounds of rhubarb cut into half-inch lengths, four pounds of sugar and one pint of water. Simmer slowly until the orange rind is soft and marmalade has thickened. Fifteen minutes before removing from fire add one cup of pecan meats cut quite fine.

MOULDED CREAM WITH STRAWBERRIES.—Soak one-fourth cup of granulated gelatin in one-fourth cup of cold water ten minutes, add one-half cup of strained strawberry juice, set the dish into a pan of hot water and stir until the gelatin dissolves. Set into a pan of cold water to cool but not long enough to thicken, stirring occasionally. Whip until stiff one pint of heavy cream which should be ice cold, beat in one-half cup of powdered sugar, and add the gelatin. Beat until the whole begins to slightly thicken, then pour into a mould. Set in a cold place, and in a few hours it should be ready to serve. Turn out onto the center of a large plate and surround with whole ripe strawberries.

PEACH GELATIN.—Soak one envelope of granulated gelatin in one-half cup of cold water ten minutes. Dissolve in one-half cup of boiling water, add one cup of sugar and stir until melted. When cold and before it begins to set, add two tablespoons of lemon juice and one cup of either fresh or canned peach mashed fine. The easiest way is to put the peach through the potato ricer. Beat thoroughly, pour into a mould and set away to harden. Gelatin dishes should be made the day before they are intended to be used as some combinations set slowly. Turn onto a platter, surround with whipped cream and sections of whole peach.

EASTER EGGS.—Break a small hole in one end of some eggs and drain out the contents. Refill the shells with colored gelatins, making it a little stiffer than usual. Very pretty colors can be obtained by using grape juice, spinach juice, cranberry juice, chocolate, orange or coffee. Set the filled shells, open end upward, to stiffen over night. To remove, carefully break the shells in places and pick them away from the gelatin eggs.

Try This Newer Form of Iron at Our Expense. Quickly Increase 'Pep', Strength and Energy

"You cannot be well and strong and full of vigor, force and power unless your blood is rich in iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician in Bellevue Hospital (Out-Door Department), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. "It is your red blood that enables you to resist and overcome disease and that nourishes every organ in your body. Without iron your blood becomes thin, pale, and watery. Poor blood cannot nourish your vital organs and as a result you may have pains in your heart or kidneys, indigestion, headaches, and feel all run-down and tired out."

When your blood lacks iron, do not waste your time taking stimulating medicines or narcotic drugs, but directly enrich your blood with the newer form of iron, known as Nuxated Iron.

You can obtain from any druggist the regular full sized package on two weeks' trial. Tear out the coupon below and get your trial bottle of Nuxated Iron today from your own druggist. Take it for two weeks and if you have not, like thousands of others, obtained most surprising new health, strength and energy, your own druggist will promptly refund your money.

Trial Coupon

Fill in this coupon with your name and address and take it to any druggist in your city. Deposit with him the price of one regular full-size bottle of Nuxated Iron. This is not a payment, but a deposit only. If you are not more than delighted with the results obtained by two weeks' use of Nuxated Iron, simply return the outside wrapper to your own druggist who will promptly refund your money. We will repay the druggist the full amount he refunds upon receipt of the coupon and wrapper.

Interference in Radio Reception

THERE are so many causes for interference in radio reception that it would be almost impossible to enumerate them all. However, there are many of these noises, such as squealing tubes, leaky power lines, loose connections, run-down batteries, etc., which may be eliminated and reception greatly improved.

The most common interference known to the broadcast listener is that caused by the wireless telegraph code sent out from the numerous commercial and amateur stations. The commercial stations consist of the wireless-equipped steamships and the shore stations which are maintained to keep in communication with the steamers. Those of us who are located near the coast are especially affected by the commercial stations but they are accorded a wave length of 600 meters, and it is only when the air becomes "jammed" that they come down on a 300-meter wave and it is then that we hear them in with the music and speech from the broadcasting stations. We cannot hope to overcome this interference and when we consider that the lives of the people at sea are at stake we can easily stand the interruption for a few minutes.

The amateur is blamed for about two-thirds of the interference but it is an unjust accusation, for the American amateurs have been very considerate of the broadcast listener and in almost every section of the country they stand by during the evening while the concerts are in progress. After 10 or 10.30 the amateur considers that he has a right to take his turn with the air. There are a few who are selfish and do not keep silent hours, but if the listeners in his vicinity would go to this amateur in a diplomatic way and reason with him, there is little doubt that he would do his best to cooperate with them.

Thus far we have taken into consideration the interference coming from the outside and over which we have no control. There are noises much more annoying and more constant than these and it merely requires a few hours of work to eliminate most of these unnecessary noises, and the results obtained will amaze those who are not familiar with the circuits of the radio.

There are no two vacuum tubes alike and it is obvious that some tubes are far more sensitive than others. As these tubes are very expensive, there is only one solution to the tube situation and that is to purchase your tubes from the most reliable firms and not be attracted by cut-price advertisements. There are several tubes now on the market which are not licensed and very few of these will give good results. Very often by changing the two amplifier tubes about it will give increased strength and clearer signals. The detector tube is known to the commercial world as a "U-V 200" tube and the amplifier tube as a "U-V 201" tube. A detector tube should be used with only enough plate voltage to make it function properly. When placing a new detector tube in a set several different plate voltages should be tried and the one giving the best results should be made permanent.

Too much stress cannot be laid upon the importance of perfect connections in the radio set. One loose connection may absolutely cut out the signals, and by a close examination the operator will soon find the trouble; but when the connection is neither loose nor solid it will give the listener no end of interference by causing a scratching noise in the telephones or loud speaker. A good way to test a set for loose connections or poor connections is to disconnect the aerial and ground leads and turn on the tubes. When all three tubes are lit there should be only a very slight hissing. Do not turn the detector tube above the normal working point or a whistle will be heard in the phones.

Batteries are also a source of much trouble unless properly taken care of. The "A" battery or storage battery should be kept charged at all times. A run-down "A" battery will not give a full-strength signal and will often cause a crackling sound in the phones. The "B" battery is even more noisy than the "A" battery when it becomes partially dead and if a set is noisy after being used some time it is well to try the "B" battery voltage. For most detector tubes a voltage of about 18 to 22 volts are required and the amplifier tube should have a voltage of at least 45 volts, and if a loud speaker is to be used a voltage of 100 volts may be used on the amplifiers.

Among the other bothersome noises we hear in the radio receivers are the crackling of a high-power line when the insulation wears off and the wire comes in contact with a tree limb or damp pole, the sparking of a motor nearby, the dentist's Gray machine and many other electrical devices within a short radius. These are, of course, more noticeable in the larger towns and cities and it is very difficult to overcome them. Experimenting with the direction of the aerial will sometimes help to obtain better results but if there is much of this type of interference near a receiving set there will not be much enjoyment in tuning for music.

Last, but not least, is the interference caused by the broadcast listener himself and it is becoming one of the greatest problems of the radio men to overcome the birdlike whistles which the numerous receiving sets send out. It is true that every regenerative receiving set may be used as a low-powered transmitter and when the detector tube is turned up to a point where a whistle is heard when a broadcast station is found on the tuner, the receiving set is sending out a wave which will cause all receiving sets within a radius of half to three-quarters of a mile to squeal. The proper way to have the set to hear music clearly is to have the detector tube turned down so that when the wave length dial is slowly turned to take a broadcasting station's wave, there will be music or voice heard in the receiver and no whistle will be heard at all. It is sometimes necessary to turn the tube up and locate a broadcasting station's wave by their whistle but immediately after the wave is located the tube should be turned down so that the music is clear but there is no whistle when the dial is slightly moved to either side of the wave. Until all broadcast listeners are made to see this point there will be little enjoyment for any of them, as the whistle from one set will entirely spoil the concert for all in their vicinity, and when several hundred sets are whistling, as the case now is in the large cities, there is no use in even trying to get music until most of them have gone to bed.

Questions and Answers

Q.—What tube is called the peanut tube?
A.—The Aeritron WD-11 is commonly called the peanut tube.

Q.—Where is station W O C located?
A.—W O C is located at Davenport, Iowa.

Q.—Will the radio that you are telling how to make in COMFORT hear music 800 miles or code that far?
A.—If instructions are carefully followed you should be able to hear at least 800 miles on a good night.

Q.—Does the Aeriola Senior use a detector tube? Please tell me a little about that set.
A.—The Aeriola Senior uses the WD-11 tube or what is known as the peanut tube. This set is probably the most efficient for a small set that is now on the market. It has a variometer in the aerial circuit and the main inductance is in series with this variometer. The tickling or regeneration is obtained by using a variometer in the plate circuit. Both variometers and the main inductance are wound on a single fiber tube and two rotors in either end of the tube. We will publish the circuit of this set in a later issue of COMFORT.

Q.—J. A. B., Blum, Texas. Please tell me what the Aeriola Senior costs, also where I can buy one. Who will send me a catalogue listing it and other radio sets?
A.—Write direct to the Radio Corp. of America, Woolworth Bldg., New York City, and ask for a copy of "Radio Enters the Home."

Q.—A. L., Pocahontas, Ill. I am a COMFORT reader and see in the paper about making a radio set. Please send me full instructions for making one and the material needed.
A.—Sorry we cannot send these instructions, but as yet we have made no copies other than those in COMFORT. Our readers interested in radio should clip and preserve the "Radio Flashes" from each issue of COMFORT, as we cannot supply back numbers.

Q.—R. C. P., Rich Hill, Mo. Where can I get a diagram and directions and list of material used in making a spider-web set capable of receiving long distances.
A.—Write to the American Radio Relay League at Hartford, Conn., and ask them to send you a copy of the Q S T magazine containing a full description of the Rhinerts tuner.

Q.—F. B., Frankfort, Ind. Will a radio set consisting of a tuning coil, detector, condenser and phones, properly grounded, give good results?
A.—Such a set would probably give results for short distance but not for more than 10 or 15 miles.

Q.—Is there a broadcasting station on the Capitol Theater in New York City?
A.—No. The programs from this theater are sent out from Station W. E. A. F. the American Telegraph and Telephone Co., New York City.

Q.—I am getting a lot of noise in my set which sounds the same as static does in the summer. Is there any static at this time of year?
A.—Yes. There is apt to be considerable static either before a storm or just after one.

Q.—Why does Arlington start sending time signals so long before 10 o'clock?
A.—The method of sending time signals is to enable ships at sea to take several readings of their chronometer and make corrections on same.

Q.—Is it possible to use a two-slide tuning coil for receiving music?
A.—Yes. However, to receive from long distances it will be necessary to place a variometer on the plate circuit. This will make the set regenerative and you will probably be able to hear distant stations.

Q.—Is it possible to use a loud speaker on a crystal receiver.
A.—Not unless you use vacuum tube amplification with the crystal detector.

What's the matter with your town, Esther, that you have not seen it in three years? It can't take that long to repair a Ford. Perhaps those weeping Indians washed all the roads away. If this is so, let me know and I'll send Billy out to give you a lift. He can travel any trail and will be glad to take you to town and treat you to a cabbage sundae at the Whitewater Pharmacy.

HIBBING, MINNESOTA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I wonder how many great grandmothers there are in the list of cousins? Now I hear you say, she belongs in the Sisters' Corner—but nothing doing! I'm fifty-eight years young, and so I want to be with the young folks—for you know that if we associate with the young we will stay young longer ourselves. Yet I love the old folks, too—the older the better. I was a great grandma at the age of fifty-two. I think I may be the youngest great grandmother in the U. S. I wonder!

I am five feet, one inch in height, weigh 93 pounds, have blue eyes, and dark brown hair, 52 inches long and just turning gray. Well, if Billy don't get this I will feel happy, for I can just see him laughing to think that I consider myself young.

Now I am going to tell you where I live. I live in the richest city in the world. It is all iron ore in the ground and they have moved more than half of the town one mile south, so that we have North and South Hibbing. It is a very healthy climate because of the iron and spring water. The largest open-pit mine in the world is here and many underground mines. The reason they moved the biggest part of the town south was because the north of the town was sitting on the richest and largest ore vein.

And speaking of moving, now Uncle, if I belong with the Sisters it is up to you to move me over, but please don't, for I like to be with the young folks. How I wish I could gather them all in my arms and be a mother to them, for I love them so. I had a group of eight of my own, and my heart goes out to the young ones. Well, Uncle, I hope I will see this in print, and I would like to have some of the cousins, boys and girls, write to me if they will—and the sisters, too. Now who will be the first to write to a poor old grandma?

Love to all and everybody. LOTTIE M. BISHOP.

Lottie, I would not call you Mrs. Bishop for all the world or your fifty-eight young years, nor would I move you over to the Sisters' Corner or anywhere else but right in with Us Folks where you belong. Your letter establishes your right to be with us, and if your hair is turning gray, it is certain your heart is still golden both in color and texture.

I think your claim to be the youngest great grandmother ought to stand, Lottie, and I hereby present it boldly and make you our League's candidate for the honor. If there are any more juvenile or lively bits of posterity in or out of the League, let 'em speak up quick.

Lottie, I agree with you that living with the young keeps us young. This is a part of the gift and glory that youth unknowingly sheds. And even reading and answering young letters helps. During the past year Bill has stopped using hair

By LIBBIE SPRAGUE PHILLIPS

SPECIAL SALE PRICE with a six (6) months' subscription to THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION ONLY 25 CENTS.

This Book contains one of this noted author's best stories.

Pressed close against the window pane was a wan, white face.

The pathos of this story sweeps before it. It touches the heart of humanity everywhere. Every man with a heart of stone turns from this story that day by day under the cold, hard exterior he has in his heart a day of human sympathy for those in that he has also a heart void of love and admiration for the pure and noble character of Rita, a gentle, loving, self-sacrificing sister. Righteous indignation is aroused toward Silas Lockwood, relentless and masterful. The heart's emotions in an excess billow, roll on from beginning to end of the book; when you lay it down and say aloud to all who rules over all for its purpose all. Thousands will send for this book and pass it on to friends. Libbie Sprague Phillips exclusively for THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION; has done so for 20 years. One minister has finished with sermons for 17 years; other writers have continued regularly for years. THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION is dignified. Its years of continued service of its writers show that everything is of fixed and standard worth. We know you will enjoy this book. Have your daughter take an fternoon nap, avoid sweets, eat a very small meal at ight and take two-grain tablets of urotropin twice a ay for several days and see what this regimen and let will do for her.

RS. J. E. S., Kinston, N. C.—The "whites" com- plained of are due probably to inflammation following aceration of the womb during confinement. Have the parts examined and if there is a laceration, be operated on and have the parts restored to normal in this way. You can use a teaspoonful of common salt to a quart of hot water as a douche morning and night in the meantime.

RS. A. L. N., Mill Creek, Okla.—Your son needs circumcision. Have this done at once. Your daughter is no doubt run down from multiple pregnancies. Have her take after meals a tablespoonful of Basham's tincture well diluted. In hay fever the chief symptom is sneezing and coryza with watery eyes, etc. Have the sufferer take after meals a teaspoonful of Pertussin well diluted. For the catarrh spray the nose and throat with Dobell's solution three times a day.

her or she might know too much about the comings and goings in this house. I'd rather have had her last night than that fool Brookes; but I was dizzy, I couldn't think."

Tears that she dared not let fall filled her eyes. There would be time enough to cry when it was safe to know that Jim was dead!

She hurried to James's room to see her before the house was roused, and when there was no sound within, opened the door.

"James!" she whispered; but she never got any farther. The room was empty; the bed neat, unslept in; the door into Gillian's room open. Mrs. Gibbs crept to it softly, not to run any risk of waking Mr. Marchmont's ward. Even James's unruffled bed had not aroused suspicion in her, but now as she looked—she knew!

The light of a rainy dawn poured in on another empty room, showed another untouched bed, and a floor littered with clothes.

Mistress and maid were gone!

The housekeeper stood livid, hideous, in the untidy room. Her face was dreadful as she turned to go, her strong hand gripped the air as though it lay already on the shrinking shoulder of the girl who had murdered Marchmont.

Quiet as a cat, she stole to Brookes's room and told him:

"Those girls—or Lesard"—she ended—"it don't matter. But I swear to you that whoever did it shall pay for it!"

The butler's face was like ashes.

A Hartford, Conn., man writes that the editor of the Courant of that city to inquire how it was that the census found half a million more married men in the United States than married women. Perhaps the uncounted wives were at the club when the enumerator called.

PEGGY ROMPERS

By Emmy Matt Rush

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"BOBBY," asked Aunt Nan in alarm, "where have you left Peggy?"

Bobby was hurrying into the dining-room, minus the little figure of his romper-clad diminutive sister and Aunt Nan had cause for alarm, for little Peggy Rompers had a naive, quaint little way of calling upon the neighbors; romper-clad or visiting-clad, it made no difference to Peggy.

"Oh, Peggy," lisped the lad, "she went over to the Smithses with Janey Smith——"

"To the Smiths'!" echoed Aunt Nan.

"Yes'm," and the subject was dismissed so far as Bobby was concerned, for he was more concerned about his dinner, and he climbed into his chair.

"To the Smiths'!" repeated Aunt Nan aghast!

Nancy Emerson hastened to the telephone, to communicate, for the first time in many years, with the Smith residence. This necessity was saved her, however, for as she was raising the receiver to her ear, Peggy's shrill little voice, filled with the excitement of the occasion, could be heard in the dining-room:

"An' it's a little girl baby, Bobby, with a real mamma all her very own!"

Something clutched Nancy Emerson's heart-strings as she replaced the telephone receiver. She stopped a moment at the entrance in the dining-room to wipe a tear from the corner of her eye. Peggy was seated in her own chair, next to Bobby's, and her little blonde head bobbed excitedly as her Aunt Nan entered the room.

"Smithes have got a little baby girl at their house, Aunt Nan!"

"Peggy, child, where have you been?"

"To the Smithses," repeated the little girl, "with Janey Smith to see her little new sister, Aunt Nan——"

"Peggy Rompers!" exclaimed her aunt, not unkindly, however, for the children were all in all to her, albeit Peggy's unconventional neighborhood calls were very often the cause for grave concern. "Peggy, you know you should have asked my permission, for I have repeatedly forbidden you to call on the Smiths with little Janey——"

"But, Aunt Nan," demurely interrupted the child, "listen, dear Aunt Nan! Janey Smith's Uncle Ben was there again, and," slowly, "he told me the baby would be named after me,"—defiantly.

"After you!" gasped Aunt Nan, more excited now than her little romping niece. "Oh, how dare he!" Her face crimsoned. "Ben Harper told you that!"

"Yes'm, Aunt Nan, and he's coming to see me after supper."

"To see you! This evening! Oh! He would not dare do that!"

* * * * * * *

For can't you see, Aunt Nan and Janey Smith's big Uncle Ben had been sweethearts in the long ago, in the high school days, days when youth with all of the pride of folly and arrogance believes it incumbent upon the dignity of future years to be unrelenting and unforgiving where one loves. And so the engagement of Aunt Nan and Janey Smith's Uncle Ben was broken! Because Pride, the Folly of Youth, demanded it!

Neither of them had married as year followed year, and the broken engagement remained broken. Ben Harper tried hard enough to mend the link, but Aunt Nan's stubborn pride would not let the link be mended, and since the children of her dead sister came into her life and home, Nancy Emerson insisted that she was too much absorbed in Peggy and Bobby to marry any man!

* * * * * * *

Peggy's mamma died when Peggy was a wee little babe, and her father died before the child was born, so that poor little Peggy Rompers knew neither father nor mother! Pathetically the child would ask: "Aunt Nan, dear, why haven't I got a mother and a father like other little girls?" To which Aunt Nan could only reply, "You precious child!" And when she said that, Peggy always thought there were tears in Aunt Nan's voice as well as in her eyes.

* * * * * * *

The evening meal passed in silence. Aunt Nan was in deep thought. So was Peggy Rompers, for that matter! And Bobby, as we have said, was more concerned with his supper than any of Peggy's wild neighborhood rambles.

Nancy Emerson resented with all the power of the pride of accumulating years Ben Harper's coming over to call on little Peggy Rompers. And yet somewhere, deep down in her heart, Nancy Emerson felt glad. Not that she would see him. Oh, no, nothing like that! But she would show Ben Harper that his arrogance could be properly punished.

* * * * * * *

The telephone bell rang. Glancing shyly at her Aunt Nan, Peggy Rompers slipped out of her tall chair. Cautiously she crept to the telephone table. Glancing shyly once more in Aunt Nan's direction, the child took down the receiver. Nancy Emerson was still absorbed in her own thoughts. Aunt Nan wasn't looking her way, thought the child. Cautiously she placed her lips to the mouthpiece.

"Yes, it's me, Peggy," she lisped.

"Yes, you can come," and stealthily replacing the receiver Peggy Rompers approached her Aunt Nan, for she was a truthful child.

Like most children with precocious and prodigal inclinations, Peggy at the same time entertained the highest sense of honor, and if truth were a virtue, then indeed Peggy Rompers, with all of the cunning and magic of her premature predilections, was a virtuously truthful little girl.

"The telephone bell rang, Aunt Nan. I answered. It was Janey Smith's Uncle Ben. He's coming right over!"

"Oh! Peggy," cried Aunt Nan, "how dare he!" And Aunt Nan disappeared.

* * * * * * *

A bright little twinkle played in Peggy Romper's clear blue eyes, and she took her place beside the front door to wait for the bell to ring, for no other hands could open the door for her caller!

Her little blonde curls nodded back and forth, and her little feet seemed to dance all over the rugs. The waiting seemed interminable.

Presently the doorbell rang. Aunt Nan was nowhere to be seen!

The maid appeared to open the door. "I will go, Martha," timidly volunteered the child, and

Black Tongue in Dogs

So many Southern readers have reported cases of black tongue in their dogs and anxiously sought a remedy that we are glad to be able to report success from the employment of a new combination of drugs. The new treatment is credited to Dr. G. W. Browning of Georgia and consists of a mixture of 15 drops of essential tincture of rhus toxicodendron, one-half an ounce each of specific tincture of echinacea and glycerin and enough water to make four ounces. The dose is one teaspoonful every two hours until improvement is marked, then every three or four hours. It is reported that this medicine, composed largely of what are known as ecletic tinctures, has reduced the mortality of the disease from 75 per cent. to 25 per cent. Local treatment consists in swabbing or spraying the mouth three or four times daily with boiled water containing enough permanganate of potash to tinge it light pink or enough sulphate of copper (bluestone) to turn it light blue.

To stop vomiting, which is a common complication of black tongue, Dr. E. L. Quitman of Chicago recommends the administration of a mixture of four drops of carbolic acid, two drams each of paregoric and subnitrate of bismuth, one ounce of glycerin, and water to make two ounces. The dose is one to two teaspoonfuls every two or three hours. If vomited, the dose should at once be repeated. In districts where the malady is prevalent dogs should be carefully fed at home and prevented from eating garbage or carrion of any kind or drinking contaminated water.

Questions and Answers

Infectious Catarrh.—We have an infectious disease in our herd of purebred Jerseys on our Stock Farm. It seems to be a kind of catarrhal affection of the head or nasal passage. They have a discharge from the nostrils sometimes blocking the air passage and causing the animal to breathe through the mouth. The first cow took the disease two years ago, last year another one, this spring five more, so you see it is spreading fast. At first our veterinarians thought it was not contagious, but they now claim it may be. They say they do not know what it is, nor do they know what to do for it. Nearly all of them get better in the fall and remain that way until the next spring when the affection returns. Every calf that is dropped by these cows has the disease, starting when about six months to one year of age. Our local veterinarian claims, after inquiring at several of their meetings that there are a number of cases of this same disease scattered around over the country. I know of some in different herds but not more than one or two to the herd. The disease starts with a slight discharge from each nostril something like a cold and gradually gets worse. The animal affected will quite frequently be seen trying to run a weed or something up her nose. The discharge is a yellowish white. I know of one or two animals that have had the disease three or four years and they are no better or worse now. They milk and do well otherwise and I have never known one to die from the affects of the disease. I would like your opinion of the disease and what you would suggest doing for it.
R. B.

A.—The disease described is not uncommon, being a form of infectious catarrh or influenza. In some cases it has been known to take on a malignant form which is incurable, similar to glanders in a horse, and fatal. The infection remains in the stable. Isolate the affected cows and fit them for the butcher as they may be "carriers of the infection when seemingly but slightly affected. Cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the stable. Use a mixture of one part of compound cresol solution and 30 parts of water for disinfecting purposes. Two or three times daily syringe out discharging nostrils with a lukewarm 1-to-1,000 solution of chinosol and expose the affected cows in the stable to steam from hot water to which two ounces of compound tincture of benzoin or oil of eucalyptus, per quart, has been added. The veterinarian should try the effect of an autogenous bacterin.

Contracted Feet.—I have a horse seven years old, that has been road-foundered for a year. His feet are hard, dry and sore. When I drive or ride him and he stands for some time he gets stiff and can hardly go at all. The trouble is mostly in his front feet.
H. C. L.

A.—Let the horse stand with his feet in a tub containing six or eight inches of cold soft water for an hour or two twice daily for a month. In the evening apply neat's-foot oil or any simple greasy hoof dressing to the feet. Keep the horse off dry board floors. If the feet are still tender and hard after the above treatment clip the hair from the hoof-bends of both fore feet and every 10 days rub in a little of a mixture of one part of powdered cantharides and 24 parts of unsalted lard. Tie him short for 18 hours, while the blister is acting. At the end of that time let him loose and apply a little lard daily to the hoof-bends. Have him shod with bar shoes at the end of the first month.

Colic.—I have a horse six years old that gets sick, having something like colic. He paws, gets down, rolls and sometimes looks at his sides. I gave him soda and syrup; this seems to relieve him. If I forget to give it to him for a few days he becomes sick again.
M. M. H.

A.—The horse is taking some indigestible feed so that a change of feed should be given. Give the drinking water before feeding. Do not feed grain or allow him much water when hot, tired and sweating after work. Feed a pound or two of hay at noon while he is cooling off. Have his teeth put in order by a veterinarian. Feed crushed or whole oats and one-ninth part of wheat bran, by weight, allowing one pound of the mixture for every 100 pounds of body weight, in three feeds, as a day's ration. Also allow a like quantity of hay, most of it to be fed at noon. Never let him stand for a single day without work or active exercise. At time of attack give him one pint of raw linseed oil as soon as the severe pain subsides. If he is bloated, one ounce of pure turpentine may be given with the oil. Rectal injections of soapy warm water and glycerin will also give relief.

Vaccinating Against Blackleg.—Will you please inform me through your paper which is the best blackleg vaccine for calves.
Mrs. C. H.

A.—The Bureau of Animal Industry of the U. S. Department has discontinued the distribution of vaccine for use against blackleg. Filtrate and aggressin are now most popular as they do not contain the live germs of the disease and therefore are preferable. Apply to the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station at Manhattan for a bulletin on the subject. One may also be obtained from your State Station at Lincoln.

Wart.—My mare, six years old, has a wart on her nose as big around as a silver dollar and twice as thick. It breaks and bleeds a little but not very often. A neighbor advised me to use iodin, which I did and believed it helped but did not cure.
F. H.

A.—Once or twice daily cover the wart with a thick paste composed of equal quantities of cold-pressed castor oil, salt and flowers of sulphur. If it is an ordinary wart that should suffice, but such growths sometimes are cancerous and return even when dissected out by a surgeon.

Cowpox.—I want information about my cow. She is giving milk and the lower part is broken out and with sores on the teats. I can hardly milk her. I have heard of cowpox; maybe that is the trouble.
Mrs. E. R. R.

A.—We think it probable that cowpox is the disease present in this case. The pustules of that disease have depressed or concave tops and a pock or depression remains for some time after the crusts fall off. Isolate the cow and have her milked by one who does not attend to the other cows. Twice daily bathe the affected parts with hot water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve; then dry gently and paint the sores with a saturated solution of permanganate of potash. If any sore is obstinate in healing apply strong iodin ointment once or twice daily, as found necessary.

Lumps on Face.—I have a heifer three years old that has a knot on her nose between her eyes and it seems to be getting larger all the time. What is the cause and what can be done? Is the milk fit to use and will other cows take it?
Mrs. W. P. C.

A.—A bruise may have caused the lump or growth, but there is a possibility of lump-jaw (actinomycosis). That disease is not directly contagious and does not make the milk or meat dangerous for use provided the animal is otherwise well, eating normally, in good flesh and free from pus-discharging abscesses or tumors. Try the effect of tincture of iodin applied two or three times a week. Do not let it get into the eyes.

Constipation.—I have a horse, fourteen years old. He is nervous, his eyes water and stream down his face. His bowels move once a day.
Mrs. L. O. B.

A.—Have the horse's teeth put in order by a veterinarian. Then feed crushed or whole oats and one-sixth part of wheat bran, adding a handful of flaxseed meal at each time of feeding. Dampen the feed. Allow free access to rock salt. Add carrots to the ration if available; also good mixed clover and timothy hay. Never let the horse stand for a single day without working or taking outdoor exercise. Do not let the horse stand where a draft can strike his eyes or dust enter them. If the stable is whitewashed light from the walls may dazzle the eyes. Add lamp black or yellow ochre when limewash again is applied. Do not cause dust by shaking down hay or straw in the stable and keep it clean and free from irritating gases.

Lice on Cattle.—Can you tell me a simple remedy for lice on cattle? They are of the large grey or blue kind.
H. W. P.

A.—Dust powdered sabadilla upon the infested parts. Then blanket the animal and brush it thoroughly out of doors six or eight hours later. Repeat the application when necessary. Groom parts, that cannot be dusted, with a brush dipped in raw linseed oil. Repeat as required. Also cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the stable which should be light, dry and well ventilated. Burn trash from stable at time of cleansing.

Wolves.—Please tell me what causes "wolves" in cows' backs, and how to get rid of them. Do they affect the cow, and if so what way?
S. G., Jr.

A.—What you term "wolves" are larvæ or grubs from eggs deposited in summer by the ox warble fly. They are usually called "warbles." When numerous they may cause enough misery from irritation to keep the cow from thriving perfectly or making a normal amount of milk. Squeeze out the ripe grubs by pressing down hard on each lump with the open mouth of a big bottle. If necessary enlarge the opening in each warble "bol." Treat others by rubbing in a little of a mixture of one part of iodoform and five parts of lard or vaseline. Destroy the grubs you squeeze out.

Chorea.—Please tell me what is the trouble with my heifer, 18 months old. It seems to be in her head, moving it up and down, and jerks in her body when drinking. Is there any cure?
Mrs. M. R. M.

A.—We suspect that the heifer has chorea (St. Vitus' dance) which is practically incurable. It may have followed an attack of some weakening disease. We cannot suggest a remedy but if you are feeding cottonseed meal and hulls we should advise you to omit that and give ground corn, oats, barley, bran and flaxseed meal, or some such combination of meals along with good hay.

Poultry Farming for Women

of time. It won't hurt to leave one or two chicks under a hen, but don't go to the other extreme of leaving nests entirely alone, because if you do, you are very apt to find chicks crushed and dead.

The next day, leave things to nature until late in the afternoon, then remove the hen to a brood coop, and give her the chicks which are hatched, for if there are any still left in the shell, they will be too weak to amount to anything if hatched later.

When the incubator has been used, the cause for chicks dying in the shell is usually want of proper ventilation, or the heat running down, or the door being opened during the last forty-eight hours. Ventilation can be best gauged by the appearance of the air cell when the egg is held before the tester. The socalled air cell is the space at the large end of the egg. In a newly laid egg it is very small. After the egg has been in the incubator for seven days, there is quite a visible space, and as evaporation progresses, it increases until the nineteenth day, when it should occupy one-fifteenth of the entire shell. If there is not sufficient ventilation in the incubator, evaporation will be retarded, and there will not be sufficient room in the shell for the chick to twist its head and break its way out; and it will die, though fully developed. If the development of the air cell is too slow, the ventilator in the incubator should be opened a little wider, and the eggs aired a little longer each day when you take out the trays to air the eggs. If the development of the air cell is too rapid, reverse the conditions and put a sponge of hot water in the machine on the nineteenth day. After turning the eggs on the morning of the eighteenth day, don't open the machine until the hatch is over, and be very careful that the heat does not run down during that time. It may go up to 104 degrees, or even to 105 without doing any harm, but it must not go below 103.

Remember, little chicks will get bowel trouble if they get chilled, so always use plenty of cotton in the top of the brooder, and never have less than twenty-five chicks in a brooder, for less than that number can't supply sufficient bodily heat to warm up the air inside of the brooder; and never neglect to take out the cotton and air it near a fire.

Watch the droppings of all chickens, both brooder and those under hens, and at the slightest indication of looseness of the bowels, remove drinking water and replace with cold tea or rice water. It is a good precaution to feed boiled rice two or three times a week while the chicks are little, and if they develop any serious trouble, keep them under cover; or if with a hen, keep the hen shut into the brooder coop, for then she is much more likely to brood than if allowed to run at large.

Leg weakness rarely develops if the chickens are properly fed. Green food and animal food must form part of their rations. There is a meat meal on the market which is very good if you can buy in small quantities, but it is not safe to buy a large bag which can't be used up in two or three weeks, so it is usually better for the ordinary farm to depend on curd cheese and an occasional hard-boiled egg, chopped up fine without removing the shell. And for green stuff I don't think there is anything as good as young clover and the young sprouts of onions, of course chopped fine enough to be acceptable to little chicks. If you are where you can get beef's liver, it is the best of all animal food when about half boiled and chopped fine and fed in small quantities. If your birds have had any kind of animal meat from the start, it is quite safe; but if you suddenly commence feeding it after four or five weeks, you must go very carefully for some time, until they become accustomed to it. A rusty nail or two, or a few drops of tincture of iron in the drinking water, is a good tonic, and it is advisable to use if chickens commence to look pale around the bill, or droopy in any way.

Of course you know they must have no food for thirty-six hours after hatching.

Glands Used To Restore Hair Growth

Science of Gland Therapy Relieves Baldness—New Treatment Restores Health and Growth.

Baldness in both men and women is now generally ascribed by scientists to defective functioning of endocrine glands. Hair growth is dependent upon the secretions of these glands, these secretions making possible the assimilation of those elements in the blood which are required for a luxurious growth of hair.

Now it is possible for any bald person to have a full, luxuriant growth of hair through the discovery of E. R. Alexander, nationally known scientist. Dr. Alexander, through the extraction of glands, can supply the deficiency of glandular secretion and produce a full growth of hair.

This discovery may be easily used in the privacy of your own home. Within a few weeks you will notice new, vigorous hair beginning to come in and with this growth you can gradually restore your hair to its former bright, healthy color.

So confident is Dr. Alexander that you can be relieved of the embarrassment of baldness and regain the normal hair growth by this method that he offers to send a regular $4.00 treatment for only $2.00 to anyone who will write for it. Use it according to directions, and if at the end of a month you do not find your hair coming in with all its former vigor, the treatment does not cost a cent.

SEND NO MONEY—just your name and address to Alexander Laboratories, 623 Grand Station, Kansas City, Mo., and this treatment will be mailed at once in plain wrapper. Use according to directions and if at the end of a month you are not more than satisfied with results, your money will be refunded at once. A big Kansas City bank guarantees that Dr. Alexander is reliable and holds $1,000 cash as a guarantee to return your money if you wish.

Don't suffer the embarrassment of baldness—give the treatment a trial on this liberal offer. Canadian office Toronto, Ont.

Sour Stomach

Best Relieved by Chewing a Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablet—No Water Needed—Carry Them Loose in Your Pocket.

What the average person needs in this day and age is the balanced stomach sweetener that he can take at any time, at any place and get relief right away. This effect is had with one or two Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. No matter what you eat or drink, if the stomach sours, gets gassy, seems to bloat and press against the heart, if you belches and heartburn makes you miserable, try these tablets. The moment they reach the stomach they neutralize the acids, they give the stomach the alkaline effect it is craving for and then you soon feel good, the stomach is settled and the faults of indigestion are thus corrected. You may now eat pie, cheese, sausage, pickles, if you get a 60 cent box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets today at any drug store.

Put Your Name On The Gearhart National Pay Roll

Sell Us Your Spare Time at Home-Earn Extra Money

Thousands Enjoy Gearhart Checks—Why Not YOU?

ARE you one of the countless men and women who find their incomes, earnings or allowances inadequate for their needs? Are you worried and harassed by unpaid bills, blue and disconsolate because you are denied the things a little extra money might bring you? Opportunity is written large on this page—read every word and solve your money problem once and for all.

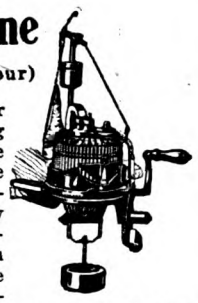
Perhaps you have read before about Gearhart Home Knitting, of famous, nationally known wool Hosiery, only to decide that however profitable it might be for others it was not for you. What a mistake you may be making!

Gearhart Home Knitting is for you, for everybody who can find much or little spare time and who is ambitious and determined enough to have the things really wanted.

Pleasant Home Occupation

(No Previous Experience Required)

Gearhart Home Knitting is just a simple, pleasant, home occupation by which all persons of average intelligence can turn their spare time into cash. No previous experience whatever required on the Gearhart Knitter, the remarkable machine which does the work for you. Our records show that our home workers can and do earn substantial amounts, large or small according to the amount of spare time they devote to the work of knitting Allwear Hosiery.



If you take up this work for us your time will be your own. You can earn as much as you will or as little as you like. We will be glad to accept and pay for all the Allwear socks you care to send us.

Pause for a moment. Realize that during the day, after the morning chores are done, the house put in order or the children sent off to school, there are hours or minutes of rest which can still be restful when you devote them to the simple task of Gearhart Machine Knitting. Then, afternoons have their golden moments and in the quiet of the evenings Gearhart Home Work holds forth its opportunity of profit.

Many times have Gearhart Home Workers written us, saying, "I am so fascinated with the work I can hardly keep away from it," or other words to the same effect.

A Wonderful Machine

(Commence Knitting in One Hour)

The Original Knitter and Home Money Maker

A wonderful machine is your valued assistant in earning "Allwear" Pay Checks. It is the fastest home knitting machine ever devised, a marvel of simplicity and quiet operation. Sixty to one hundred speedy, racing, automatic needles operate as you simply turn the crank to do home knitting of Allwear socks so beautifully and so rapidly that in many cases amazement follows when you first begin. You need only spare time which no doubt you have. Secure a Gearhart and commence to knit in one hour or less.

The Gearhart Knitting Machine is the original home knitter, perfected in the 35 years that the Gearhart Company has been established. It is the only home knitter that knits Allwear Hosiery, modern, up-to-the-minute wool socks which are now so much in popular favor. Gearhart Home Workers are proud of the soft, warm comfort, the wearing qualities and the luxurious appearance of these quality socks, unknown in the days of grandma and olden time hand knitting methods. This remarkable machine does the knitting, you operate and guide it.

Long-Time Contract for You

(Guarantee the Basis of Your Pay Checks)

Household or other work may not allow you to work in a store, factory or office and if you did there is always the possibility of being laid off. But when you become a Gearhart Home Worker you can't be laid off or discharged. You know that when you take up Gearhart Home Work you enter into something lasting. An iron-bound, long-time contract for a period of years is a bona fide, legal agreement on the part of the Gearhart Company to accept and pay you for all the Allwear Hosiery you care to knit and send to them. The contract stipulates the liberal price per dozen pairs the Company agrees to pay you. Earn as much as you wish within the limits of your spare time. The Gearhart Company cannot emphasize too emphatically the fact that they want Allwear Hosiery and lots of it. You can help and by so doing earn the extra money which may mean so much to you.

How Much Can I Earn?

At the time of writing this message to you we have referred to our records and find that during a recent week we sent out hundreds of "Allwear" Pay Checks. A few of these we mention and they represent neither the highest nor the lowest payments made during those six days of business.

To Mrs. B. we paid $7.25, to Mr. C., $15.84, to Mrs. L. G., $10.38, to Mrs. E. K., $7.50, to Mr. R. M., $7.50, to Mrs. G. C., $6.00, to Mr. C. D., $9.00, to Miss M. H., $5.75, to Mrs. P., $16.94, etc., etc. (Names and addresses are not given because all dealings with home workers are held confidential.)

So you see this matter of Gearhart Home Knitting is pretty much what you make of it. Some people naturally have more spare time for knitting than others. Whatever you have, much or little, we want you to devote it to knitting Allwear Hosiery, receiving our pay checks like the above or for amounts even larger.

Your Extra Money Problem

What kind of a money problem must you solve? What is it you need or want that only may be acquired through a better-filled purse? Might it be money to pay pressing bills, to keep the children in school, refurnish the home, buy needed wearing apparel, start a bank account against a rainy day or add to the comfort of self or family in some other way?

Or maybe there are less serious needs which are none the less to be desired. Perhaps you are merely ambitions to earn and accumulate more than seems possible under present circumstances. Whatever your requirements, let Gearhart Home Knitting prove to be your friend and a help to the fulfillment of your fondest hopes. Of course you are sensible and do not expect to get rich quick by this simple employment of your spare time. It is recorded that home knitters have paid off mortgages, bought houses and automobiles but perhaps you will be satisfied with a fair remuneration, a few dollars a week if that is all your spare time will yield or several hundred dollars per year if you can turn out a much greater quantity of good work. Whatever your circumstances, whatever your ambitions, "Allwear" Checks in any amount await your best efforts. You may also get help from other members of the family and increase your pay checks.

Gearhart Encouragement

The Gearhart Knitting Machine Company has always been solicitous of the welfare of Gearhart Home Workers. Everything practicable has been done to encourage the production of Allwear Hosiery and bigger earnings. A great national market for the socks has been developed, the finest home knitting instruction book ever devised has been printed, the highest rates of pay possible have been made a part of Gearhart Contracts and now the Gearhart Company leads again with its offering of still greater possibilities of home earnings afforded by great contest and bonus awards such as you find announced on this page.

The Gearhart Company occupies two great buildings in the hustling city of Clearfield, Pa. These are the national headquarters of the American Home Knitting Industry, where the famous Gearhart Knitter is made, where Allwear Hosiery is received from all over the country and from where it is distributed to its thousands of wearers. You may well take pride in association with this solid, responsible concern, established in 1888.

Easy Now to Rid Your Farm of Rats

Wonderful Discovery by Noted Scientist Kills Every Rat Within a Week's Time—Not a Poison.

Rats cost farmers over two hundred millions of dollars a year, through the destruction of grain, poultry and buildings. Farmers need no longer suffer this loss because they can now kill off all the rats on their farm in less than a week's time. This is possible through the remarkable discovery of E. R. Alexander, a Kansas City chemist, who has perfected a virus which kills rats, mice and gophers as though by magic. This product is not a poison—it can be eaten by human beings or any animal on the farm as safely as their regular food, but means quick, sure death to rats.

This wonderful rat virus, which is known as Alexander Rat-Killer, is merely mixed with bread or meat scraps and placed where rats, mice or gophers can get to it. Within a few hours after a rat has eaten Alexander Rat-Killer he gets a high fever and suffers a terrible thirst. He leaves the barns and nesting holes and goes to the open fields in search of pure air and running water. Rats and mice affected always die away from the barns and houses, so there is no odor.

It is a scientific fact that one rat affects others and soon the whole colony leaves the buildings and dies. And though this virus is absolutely deadly to rats—chickens, hogs, cattle or any farm animal can eat it and not be affected at all.

So confident is Mr. Alexander that Alexander Rat-Killer will kill every rat on your farm in less than a week's time that he offers to send, as an introductory offer, a regular $2.00 tube for only $1.00. Give it according to directions, and if at the end of a week's time you are able to discover any rats, mice or gophers on your farm, your money will be refunded. A big Kansas City bank guarantees that Mr. Alexander is reliable and will do as he says.

Send NO MONEY. Just write to E. R. Alexander, Alexander Laboratories, 184 Gateway Station, Kansas City, Mo., and the tube will be mailed at once. When it arrives, pay the postman only one dollar and postage on the guarantee that if not absolutely satisfactory your money will be returned without question. Write today—a postcard will do—and stop your rat losses now.

Stale wheat bread crumbled fine and mixed with hard-boiled egg which has been chopped without removing the shell; about two heaping tablespoonfuls of the latter in a cup of crumbs; the combination just moistened with scalded milk and fed for breakfast and supper; for a few days a small pan filled with millet, rape seed, Kaffir corn (slightly bruised) and fine sand, is placed just within the youngster's reach, but where the hens cannot get at it—have this there all the time. When about a week old have a mash made of hulled oats, ground coarse; corn meal and wheat, equal parts of each, steamed for three or four hours. To each cupful of this add just before feeding a teaspoonful of bone meal and beef meal and mix well. Feed three times a day all they will eat up clean in five minutes. If you haven't a steamer, a very good substitute may be made by getting a two-quart tin pail with a close-fitting lid—a lard pail will do nicely; put the meal in it, pour in sufficient boiling water to just moisten it; close down lid and stand in a four- or five-quart pail with a tight-fitting lid; put in enough boiling water to reach half way up the sides of the smaller one. This is a good way to cook rice or cereal of any kind for your own table, if the establishment doesn't boast of a double boiler. After the babies are two weeks old the hen may be allowed to wander with them, after the dew is off the grass in the morning until about four in the afternoon. The pan of mixed seeds can be removed, the bone and bone meal omitted (except at supper time, when it is best to continue the bone for another two or three weeks). Vary this at noon by feeding pot cheese and boiled liver chopped with green onions. If you can't get the bone or beef meal where you live, thoroughly air slake some lime and scatter it about the run, and get beasts' liver and lights from the butcher. This feed is to ensure bone and feathers. If you have very few chicks, and the place is remarkably good for grubs and insects, the chicks which are on free range with a mother hen will be able to pick up all the animal food they want.

M. M.—From your description of the lumps on the liver of the bird you opened, leaves no doubt that this was a case of tuberculosis—a most difficult disease to stamp out. It is very contagious, and contaminates the entire premises, the germs being distributed by means of the infected birds' dropping. One light chronic case may be the unsuspected cause of frequent outbreaks. The germs are often contained in eggs laid by infected birds. Rats and mice also carry the disease. So you see extreme vigilance is necessary to prevent its spreading, if there is even one chronic case in the neighborhood. One of the worst features of the disease is that cases rarely attract attention in the early stages. Even a professional poultryman often fails to notice any symptoms of the disease until it reaches its last stages. For this reason an entire flock is often exposed to contagion before it is suspected. There is no cure for a bird which has once developed tuberculosis, so the only safe plan, after it is known that a bird has really died from the disease, is to kill off all suspicious looking birds and burn the carcasses, then kill and sell the birds which may have been exposed to the contagion without loss of time, and before the disease has developed. After that, cut out all of the old stock, thoroughly clean the house, scrape off the surface of the yard or ground on which the birds have been in the habit of congregating, and burn, or bury very deeply, all the accumulated rubbish, and next spring make a fresh start with healthy stock.

I. G. G.—Fowls are killed by what is called limberneck. The name describes their condition, for their necks are surely limber, but it gives no hint of the cause. The cause is ptomaine poisoning. Because of lack of knowledge as to the cause, people do not know how best to prevent the trouble. Many know that it is noticed after fowls have eaten maggots, and the statement is made that maggots do not die when eaten, and being alive in the fowl, cause trouble. This cannot be true, for maggots are a natural food for fowls; they are dangerous only when they contain poison from decaying flesh. The poison, if present in the maggots, soon stops the processes in the stomach, and the maggots may live longer than they would, were the digestive organs of the fowl able to do their proper work. In some cases the symptoms assume a different guise, and the bird, instead of having what is known as limberneck, develops the condition known as "wry neck," a twisting backward of the head and neck upon the body, the head being sometimes turned almost entirely around. Both of these ailments arise from similar causes. In the majority of cases they are due to intestinal irritation of some sort. The wry neck is more likely to be a symptom of epileptic disease or direct brain and nerve irritation, while limberneck more frequently occurs accompanying attacks of colic, acute indigestion, irritation from intestinal parasites (worms), crop inflammation or similar troubles. Where not due to direct brain or nerve disease, such as epilepsy, a hereditary tendency to a disordered condition of nervous system, the disease is easily remedied. The most frequent causes of acute indigestion and colic are indiscretions in feeding. Impure meat food or a too one-sided ration is a common cause of limberneck, resulting from acute indigestion or colic in small chicks. Fright and over exertion from being chased are also causes. In chicks and fowls of all ages, putrid meats, feeding upon large quantities of maggots, or eating indigestible or poisonous substances, are common causes of limberneck. When the birds, either young or old, have been fed raw meat in any considerable quantity, or have been running on old, contaminated ground that has not been promptly renovated, worm parasites are a common cause of this trouble. The disease may be prevented by careful feeding and the removal of all sources of infection. The following treatment will be found effective in the majority of cases, and is undoubtedly the best for regular routine treatment: When the case is first discovered, administer a small dose of oil of turpentine mixed with sweet oil. For small chicks, from two to ten drops of turpentine mixed with an equal amount of sweet oil will be found sufficient, according to age, while adult birds will take from one to two teaspoonfuls of oil of turpentine mixed with an equal quantity of sweet oil. Keep the bird warm and quiet. Fifteen minutes to half an hour after the dose of turpentine, give warm, sweet milk to which has been added a little ginger. Make in the same manner that you would prepare ginger tea for a youngster who had an attack of green apple colic, one teaspoonful of finely powdered pure ginger thoroughly mixed with half-a-cup of hot milk, and barely sweetened with a little sugar. For small chicks, give one-half to one teaspoonful every hour or two. Adult fowls may have one to two tablespoonfuls at a dose. Another good remedy for adult birds is to use a pill made as follows: Equal parts of pure lard, cayenne pepper, powdered ginger and mustard. Rub all together until thoroughly mixed, then divided into pills or slugs the size of a kidney bean. Give one of these pills or slugs at a dose and repeat in three hours if necessary. The bird will usually show signs of improvement at once, and in from ten to twenty-four hours will be ready to go back to a regular food ration, which should consist at first of a little thoroughly cooked boiled rice, lightly sprinkled with salt. Follow this with feedings of raw potato, raw beet, and a limited supply of dry grain and pure beef scrap. The trouble will seldom recur when due to colic or other digestive disturbances, provided care is taken to supply a plentiful amount of raw vegetable food in addition to the meat foods and grains. When the above treatment fails to act, the trouble is due to some serious nerve or brain disease, and it will be best to kill the bird, but do not despair of saving a chick or fowl affected with limberneck until you have at first given this method of treatment a fair trial.

J. H.—Please read answer to M. M. in this issue.

E. E.—I believe that there is a remedy on the market, which is supposed to rid poultry of lice if used in their drinking water, but so far I have not tried it, so cannot express any opinion, except that it is manufactured by a reliable firm, and so should possess some value.

F. K.—You don't tell me anything about the way you feed, the age of the birds, or if they are confined to yards or are on free range, and in a case such as you describe the information is necessary to enable me to decide which of three diseases caused the trouble. Liver trouble is so often the cause of leg weakness, purple combs and diarrhea that I will take it for granted that that is the trouble. Cut down the amount of table scraps and whole grains. Give plenty of green vegetables, and use cracked or small grains scattered broadcast in deep litter, which will compel the birds to scratch for a living, and so get the exercise they need. Add one teaspoonful of magnesia to every quart of drinking water, every second day, for two weeks. Clean up droppings every day, and give the birds free range, if possible. If, however, the birds have been on free range, you had better look around outside for the cause of the trouble. Can the hens get at the pig swill? Swill kept for pigs is often the unsuspected cause of diarrhea and liver trouble. Always be careful of any strong fertilizer that may be used around the farm.

F. H.—It may be possible for these baby turkeys in California during the winter, but I rather doubt it, as the nights are cold, and you have a good deal of rain. Cracked wheat and oats, all the sour milk they will drink, and the finely-chopped tops of green onions, will help out your rations.

J. G.—If you can't get the rue leaves at the drug store in your town, perhaps they can tell you the address of some herbalist of whom you can get them. Change of climate would not have any influence after the birds were affected.

W. A. W.—It is against our rules to recommend breeders in this column.

H. J. G.—A comfortable house is essential, and the best plan for a small flock is to build a regular chicken-house and cover it all over with tar paper or one of the good roofing papers. The yard must be enclosed, of course, and should extend over the roof, and five or six feet above it, so the birds can alight on it when flying from end to end, and sun themselves (which they love to do), on a high, dry place. Put up two or three high perches at the end of the yard: a stand about three feet high in the center for a bathtub. Let the stand be a foot larger all around than the tub, so the birds can light on it. The size of the house must depend, of course, on the number of birds you intend to keep. Just remember that each pair of old pigeons must have two nest boxes eleven inches square, with an earthenware pan in each. Nest boxes can cover the wall from floor to ceiling, so after it is fitted, it is easy to tell just how many birds a house can accommodate. The earthenware pans are called nappies, and are manufactured on purpose for pigeons. They can be bought at any supply store for five or ten cents each. There is a brown crockery dish about seven inches across and two deep, which is to be found in most five- and ten-cent stores, that answers very well if you can't get the real things in your immediate vicinity. Now about feeding. Just throwing down cracked corn won't do. Variety in diet is necessary for birds' health as well as for man and beasts. It is wise to give the food question a little thought. Kaffir corn, red wheat, cracked corn, Canadian field peas, German millet and hemp are all staple grains. Use whichever can be got cheapest in your vicinity, and alternate them whenever you can. We follow the rule recommended by Mr. W. E. Rice, a very successful pigeon raiser: Morning: Equal parts of cracked corn, Kaffir corn and wheat. Evening: Cracked corn and Canadian peas. These regular meals are put into feed boxes in quantity sufficient to insure the birds having a constant supply. Treats, which we feed at odd times, such as millet, hemp and rice, are thrown on the ground; for, as they are only fed in comparatively small quantities, they are eaten up at once, and so there is no danger of their becoming soiled. Remember always to buy red, not white, wheat, for the latter is very apt to cause diarrhea. Regular feeds are always placed in a self-feeder, so that the birds may help themselves. Peas, millet, hemp and rice are good only as treats once or twice a week. They are fed in small quantities, and alone, because we found out that if mixed with other grains, the birds would pick out the dainties and throw out the grain or wheat. Unless starved to it, pigeons will not eat grain that has been defiled by lying on the floor, so to prevent waste it is best to have a self-feeder, or at least some contrivance which prevents birds getting their head or feet into the supply and scattering it. The treats we feed by hand, and scatter on the floor, but if the birds are naturally eager for a novelty, it is picked up at once. Remember that white wheat is very likely to produce diarrhea, so always order red, and don't be tempted to use new grain of any sort, or corn exclusively, for if you do, your birds will surely be troubled with canker. During the year, and especially in the early winter, I always receive letters asking why pigeons are afflicted with a strange disease of the throat and mouth, which looks like a cheesy growth; and it is for that reason that I caution you against the exclusive corn diet, for that is what caused the trouble, and often spoils the whole breeding season. Powdered alum sprinkled in the drinking water now and then will tend to ward off canker from a flock. It does not pay to dose sick pigeons, because a cure seldom is obtained by dosing, and you are out your time. The only remedies you need are powdered alum and common brown ginger. The brown ginger is for the purpose of counteracting any tendency to diarrhea which you may observe. Sprinkle it in the drinking water. The squab breeder who follows the advice as to feed and water, and cleanliness of squab houses, will not have any sick pigeons. It is so very easy to keep a pigeon in perfect health that the fear of disease is a bugbear not worth taking into account. The element of disease is a constant source of worry to the chicken breeder, and a source of heavy loss to the best of them. We wish to assure all who contemplate starting in the squab breeding business that the pigeon naturally is a healthier and more rugged bird than the domestic hen and that positively you will not be fussing with remedies and curealls in handling them. "Going light," or wasting away, is an ailment of pigeons occasionally met with. The cause of it is an absence of grit and salt. If your staples of feed are provided as we tell, and you give a variety of feed, and you provide grit and oyster shells, you will have no cases of "going light." The disease is known by a steady wasting away of the pigeon. Catch it and you feel a prominent breast bone and scanty flesh, showing that some element in the feed is lacking. The principal cause of these ailments of pigeons, next to filth, is too much corn. Corn is carbonaceous and produces fat, which heats the blood and lays the system open to disease. Cleanliness is even more imperative in the pigeon-house than in the henhouse. Never neglect to scald out the earthenware nest, and whitewash the compartment it stands in, every time squabs are removed for market, for it is only by such rigid system that the place can be kept in sanitary condition. Pigeons must have salt, shell and charcoal to be healthy, so there should be a self-feeder with three compartments in each house. When ordering, specify that the oyster shell is for pigeons, as it is to be broken up smaller than for hens. The rock salt and charcoal should be ground to about the size of rice. During the heavy breeding season crush most of the grain, and always peas, for when the parent birds are rushed for time between their two nests they are very liable to pick up whole grain and feed it to the young birds before they are able to digest it. Until we discovered this carelessness, we often had a dead squab in the nest. The feed boxes can be filled up, as pigeons never overeat, and must have access to food at all times when they have young ones to feed. Once a week we give them a meal of stale bread which has been steeped in skim-milk and squeezed almost dry again, for we have lots of skim-milk, and the bread we get from a baker in town. We find it a desirable feed when there are a lot of squabs to be fattened for market.

W. F.—For commercial egg production in a temperate climate like Florida, light-weight birds would be best; any variety of Leghorns, Anconas or Andalusians.

S. A. G.—Allow no male birds with the hens which are kept for producing table eggs. Infertile eggs keep longer than fertile ones. No, I should not think it would be safe to send dressed poultry by parcel post in hot summer weather unless the distance was very short, and even then a special delivery stamp should be added to the mileage, to insure quick delivery.

BERTRAM.—You give me no idea of the age of the birds, your method of feeding, or whether they are on free range or confined in yards, and in a case such as this, it is impossible to arrive at any opinion of the trouble without such information. Write me again, and give me the lacking information, and I shall be glad to help you. Meantime, bathe the eyes and head with boric acid, one teaspoonful to a glass of water.

German medical research students put bacteria in iron cylinders, launch them into the alimentary canal, open them with magnets, release the bacteria, let them fill up with fluid from the canal, close them again and finally make analyses of the contents. All this is done without cutting the patient.

Ford Runs 57 Miles on Gallon of Gasoline

A new automatic vaporizer and Decarbonizer, which in actual test has increased the power and mileage of Fords from 25 to 50 per cent and at the same time removes every particle of carbon from the cylinders is the proud achievement of John A. Stransky, 3461 South Main Street, Pukwana, South Dakota. A remarkable feature of this simple and inexpensive device is that its action is governed entirely by the motor. It is slipped between the carburetor and intake manifold and can be installed by anyone in five minutes without drilling or tapping. With it attached, Ford cars have made from 40 to 57 miles on one gallon of gasoline. Mr. Stransky wants to place a few of these devices on cars in this territory and has a very liberal offer to make to anyone who is able to handle the business which is sure to be created wherever this marvelous little device is demonstrated. If you want to try one entirely at his risk, send him your name and address today.—Adv.

Science's Discovery Routs Chicken Lice

Mineralized Water Gets Rid of Dusting and Spraying — Birds Delouse Themselves. Fine for Baby Chicks and All Poultry.

A recent discovery promises to revolutionize the commonly accepted methods for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful product keeps the poultry always lice-free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice-Go, which is the name of this remarkable lice remedy, is dropped in the drinking water. Taken into the system of the bird, it comes out through the oil glands of the skin and every louse or mite leaves the body. It is guaranteed to help the hatchability of the eggs and cannot injure the flavor of the eggs or meat. It is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days treatment at the start and then a little added to the drinking water each month is all that is necessary.

Send No Money—just your name and address to Chas. M. Hick & Company, Dept. 311, 1611 Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. A card will do. Mr. Hick is so confident that Hick's Lice-Go will get rid of every louse or mite that he will send you a large double strength $1.00 packages for the price of one. When they arrive, pay postman only $1.00 and postage. Sell one to your neighbor and get yours free. If you are not absolutely satisfied after 30 days trial, your money will be refunded. This offer is guaranteed by two big Chicago banks, who say that Mr. Hick will do exactly as he agrees without question or argument. Write today before this remarkable trial offer is withdrawn.

The Modern Farmer

"big bread basket" that every dairyman loves to see, for he realizes that the good feeder must have plenty of storage space for that feed.

If these points are kept in mind in selecting calves, and if those picked out are true to the breed type and are similar in markings, the owner is taking the right steps in the formation of his herd for future years.

How to Build Good Crates

No matter what kind or size of crate you intend to build, the fundamental methods are essentially the same in all. A few hours' work intelligently applied will complete a crate that will last for a long time, even with the hardest usage. On the other hand, the same amount of time and labor, and the same investment in good quality lumber, may go for naught due to the failure of the builder to apply the following rules which have been thoroughly tested and proved:

There are seven steps in the process of constructing a crate. 1. Build the floor first. 2. Build each side separately. 3. Nail the sides to the floor by nailing the uprights to the skids. 4. Cut the top and end slats. 5. Nail the top and end bars, spacing them properly. 6. Build the end gate. 7. Put in the stanchion (provided the crate is to be used for shipping cattle; not necessary otherwise).

White pine is an excellent wood for crates, but other woods may be used. In the same class with white pine are popple or aspen, basswood, cypress, chestnut, Jack pine, Norway pine, spruce, Western yellow pine and yellow poplar. Other woods may be used in emergencies, but should not be used otherwise; most of them are difficult to nail, heavier to ship, and do not last well. Particularly is this true of hemlock, which splinters easily, does not stand rough handling, and is both heavy and "splintery" to handle. Years of research and experimental work conducted by the Federal Forest Products laboratory has proved that lumber one inch thick and four inches wide is best for crate making. In these tests the floor, perhaps the weakest point in most crates, has been particularly studied. To avoid weakness the experts advise that floor boards be laid crosswise upon the skids. Skids should be two by two for ordinary purposes, and two by four in crates designed for cows or young bulls.

Red-Necked Raspberry Borer

Growers of raspberries, blackberries or dewberries whose bushes are seriously infested with the red-necked cane borer should make the most of the winter and early spring months, for it is at this time that the most can be done to "get the upper hand" over this pest.

First cut out all canes showing the characteristic swellings or galls enlarging them. Do this before the weather becomes warm; otherwise the adult beetles will emerge from the galls and produce a new brood. Pile all the infested canes on bare ground and burn them promptly and completely. Do not make the common mistake of cutting out the canes and piling them to one side of the berry patch and leaving them there. Remember that the adult insect which is responsible for the galls can fly.

To insure thoroughness, cut all wild blackberry, raspberry or dewberry plants that may be found growing along the roadside or in woods nearby. These bushes, as well as the tame ones in the farm berry patch, are likely to be infested with borers, and to clean out the home patch without removing this wild nursery only lets your own work go for naught. If several of your neighbors also have blackberry or raspberry bushes in their gardens, talk over with them the matter of cleaning up the borers. Results are more lasting if all berry growers work together.

For those who are not acquainted with the raspberry borer, here is a brief description of the offender: Any neglected berry patch will here and there show canes with swellings or enlargements that are irregular in shape and size, sometimes so big that the bark is split. If one of these galls is broken or cut open a flat-headed, milk-white borer will be found inside. This is the larva of a small, slender, velvet-black beetle with coppery red or golden thorax ("neck"). The adult insect does some little damage itself by feeding on the foliage of berry bushes, but as the parent of the larvæ or "worms" it is most harmful, for canes with galls either die or fail to bear.

Questions and Answers

KILLING WOODCHUCKS.—How can I get rid of the woodchucks once and for all that are burrowing in my orchard and eating more clover in the nearby hay fields, where they are also becoming a nuisance by digging burrows, piling up the soil to interfere with the mower, and making holes that are dangerous for my horses. Have tried to smoke them out or smother them with the gas from the exhaust pipe of my Ford, but have not had very good luck, though this method was recommended highly to me by my uncle in Pennsylvania.
T. C. O'K., Conn.

A.—If you have not had good success with the exhaust pipe method of killing woodchucks, the fault may be this: If your soil is light and inclined to be a bit sandy, and you have made the attempts when it was very dry, the gas escaped into the porous soil. Perhaps it would work fine when the soil is quite wet. You might try it again under more favorable conditions. Here is another plan that has been extensively used to advantage: Take pint bottles, fill them two-thirds full of ordinary black or blasting powder, and add a couple of teaspoonfuls of red pepper. Shake up well. Drill a hole in the cork big enough to admit a piece of ordinary fuse two feet long. Make several of these "bombs" at the same time. Put them into a basket and go out where the chucks have their holes. Don't be afraid; the bottle will not explode until set off with a match. Light fuse, drop into a hole that slants steeply and straight downward, then step out of the way. No need to run far. The explosion will be well smothered under ground. Between the concussion, the powder fumes, and the "sneeze gas" created by the red pepper, Mr. Woodchuck is usually done for. This is a cheap and quick method that will work well most anywhere at any time while the chucks are active.

A VERMIN-REPELLING WASH.—Can you advise me how to protect my fruit trees from being girdled by mice and rabbits in the winter time without wrapping them in paper or screen? I have done this, but it costs money and takes time. Besides, I have to do the work over again every second year or so. Isn't there some sort of paint or something that I could put on instead?
WM. MACN., Vermont.

A.—Yes, there is a wash that can be used to protect fruit trees from mice and rabbits gnawing the bark when deep snow is on the ground. It is made by taking 20 pounds of unslaked lime, 15 pounds of flowers of sulphur, six pails of water, and boiling the mixture together in an old wash boiler for an hour or more, stirring thoroughly from time to time, until a thick smooth cream is formed. Then transfer to a barrel and add water enough to fill, making about 45 gallons of liquid, or enough to protect about 200 average sized fruit trees. To improve the adhesive or sticking qualities, add a couple of pounds of glue or common salt to the mixture. With an old whitewash brush apply to the trunks of trees, beginning at the ground and extending up to a point well above ordinary snow level. The best time to do this is late in the fall before snow comes, but it can be done at any time during the winter when the ground is not under snow. One treatment will serve throughout the entire winter if evenly and carefully applied. A power sprayer can be used for the purpose, also, but it has no advantage over the brush, as it is not necessary to apply the wash to branches that would be hard to reach.

HAIRY OR SAND VETCH, WHICH?—I have had an argument with a neighbor which I would like you to answer. I have some vetch growing on a piece of light soil. He calls it "sand vetch" but I bought it as "hairy vetch." The stems are hairy, so I think I am right; he says it is sand vetch because it grows on sandy land. Do not know much about it as a crop, as I put it in as an experiment on poor soil. Is it a good crop to raise?
M. P. W., Ohio.

A.—Judging from your rather brief description, it appears that you are both right, for the same plant is known by either name, depending upon the locality. Hairy vetch is a good, reliable plant that is worthy of a place on any farm. It is a soil builder well known in the sandy lands of Poland, Russia, Finland, Germany and Great Britain, where it has been grown for generations, converting light soil into valuable and productive agricultural land. It keeps the ground well covered with snow during the winter, remaining green under the snow blanket, and starting growth in the first warm days of spring. Frequently it grows so fast that a crop of hay can be made in time to plow the land for silage corn or soy beans. It is a very good plant to employ for the addition of nitrogen to a poor soil; also serves well to prevent leaching and erosion in winter. It will grow in soil too cold for clover or alfalfa, and will grow on soil that is so wet that it is fit only for alsike clover. On clay soil or in sandy land it seems to grow almost equally well, and because of its adaptability to a wide range of soil, moisture and climatic conditions, it is destined to become much more widely known and grown.

SKIPPERS IN MEAT.—Last year I lost some meat on account of skippers getting into it. Please tell me what to do to the meat in curing it to prevent the skippers from getting in it, also how to sugar cure meat.
MRS. R. M., Gallagher, W. Va.

A.—To avoid damage by skippers to meat while in the smoke house, precautions must be taken beforehand. Skippers are the larvæ (maggots) of very tiny black flies that closely resemble common houseflies. Due to their very small size, they can get into almost any place they desire through the tiniest of crevices. Therefore go over the smoke house to see that all crevices are sealed up; this serves a double purpose, as thus the smoke also is better kept inside. Clean up all such refuse as odd ends of greasy rope or grease adhering to boards; grease may contain the larvæ of the flies, which will soon mature into flies and get into new meat. Start the smoke once or twice, at ten-day intervals, prior to the time that meat is hung in the smoke house, thus killing any flies that may be waiting there—even though you do not see them—for a chance to "board" on your next batch of ham or bacon. See that the smoking is thoroughly done, not rushed or stopped before so thoroughly smoked that skippers will not be attracted to it. Then store in the house in a room that is cool and dry and that has been freshly whitewashed to kill both flies and their larvæ. Put good screens or a cheese-cloth covering on all windows to keep out skipper flies. If the skippers have been had in the storeroom in the past, fumigate the tightly sealed room with pyrethrum powder or tobacco scattered on live coals in an iron bucket. Repeat this treatment two or three times before meat is hung in the room, waiting a week or ten days between treatments to kill the flies that may have hatched from maggots in the meantime. Allow time for the fumes of the "smudge" to escape before meat is placed in the room.

To sugar cure hams and bacon, allow to cool thoroughly before placing in the curing vessel such as a large crock or clean barrel. Rub hams, bacon and shoulders thoroughly with salt, then allow to remain on the cutting table or bench over night. Next day pack into curing vessel with hams at the bottom and bacon pieces toward the top. For each 100 pounds of meat, prepare a brine consisting of eight to 10 pounds of common barrel salt, three pounds of brown sugar and two ounces of saltpeter. Mix thoroughly and dissolve in four gallons of boiling water. Allow the mixture to cool before pouring over the meat. Never pour hot brine over meat. Weight the meat down with a round board and a clean stone; never use iron, as the salt will rust it. Keep meat completely covered with brine. Keep the vessel in a cool place. If brine shows signs of fermenting, pour it off, boil it, allow it to cool, then pour it back over the meat. Bacon should be ready to smoke in five to six weeks; hams should have six or seven weeks. Bacon may safely be left as long as the ham, however, then all may be smoked together to save time and trouble.

CELERY CULTURE.—I want to grow celery. Please tell me when to sow seed, when to transplant, how to cultivate, how to bleach celery, and what kind of soil is best for it.
MRS. W. N. B., Mansfield, Ga.

A.—Celery grows best on a loamy soil that is rich in vegetable matter. Drained marshland providing a murky soil that retains moisture well; but still is well drained, is ideal for this crop. Well-rotted stable manure liberally applied, combined with plowing to a depth of 10 inches or more, gives best results. Plant celery seed, which is very small and slow to sprout, in protected beds or in trays. Have the soil in excellent tilth. Plant seeds barely below the surface; keep moist but not wet until sprouting and thereafter. Never allow the starting bed to become dry and hard. When plants are one inch tall they must be transplanted—a very tedious and careful operation. Set them one inch apart in rows spaced two inches apart, choosing only the best and strongest plants with best root growth. Keep soil moist and remove weeds by stirring the soil between the rows with a sharp stick regularly. When plants have reached a height of five or six inches they are ready for transplanting to the field. Set plants ten inches apart in beds anywhere from six feet to 12 feet square. This planting plan is known as the "new culture system" and has many advantages over the various styles of row planting. Plants are spaced 10 inches each way, cultivated thoroughly—preferably with a hoe frequently and carefully handled—until they "lock tops" or fill the bed. By simply placing wide boards on the four sides of each bed blanching is brought about by the dense shade cast by the close-growing plants. Blanching with boards or hilled-up soil, practiced in the row systems, is much more tedious and not a bit more satisfactory. For best varieties of celery adapted to your locality, write to your Agricultural Experiment Station, located at Athens, Georgia, requesting the free bulletins that will be promptly supplied on celery culture, best planting dates, etc., for your own region of the state.

3-Feet Runner BEAN

Everyone who has seen this wonderful bean growing or eats of it, says: "I never saw its equal." Just think of a rampant growing polo bean hanging full of tender delicious pods which grow nearly or quite a yard in length. When cooked they have a delicious asparagus flavor, rivaling almost any other bean. This is just the bean for the small garden, where a great yield is desired. Every garden in America ought to have this bean—delicious to eat—profitable to grow.

GIANT BUTTER BEAN
The Most Wonderful BEAN in the World

A Record breaking FOOD producer. Comes from the ground in a few days, and grows quickly to a height of two feet, on a strong, sturdy stalk.
This bean produces profusely. We have counted over 100 blossoms on ONE stalk. The pods grow straight out from the stalk and its branches, and bean itself is often the size of a SILVER DOLLAR. Peggy Rompers when Peggy Rompers opened the door she bounded right into the strong arms of a man. It was Janey Smith's "big Uncle Ben"!

"It's all right, Uncle Ben," whispered the little girl in his ear. "It's all right, I know, because Aunt Nan never said one word."

A tender light filled Uncle Ben's big, brown countenance, and his eyes shone with the pent-up devotion of a big man, and with a love that had had been denied him for many years.

"Where is she?" he whispered.

"I think you'll find her in the garden."

And Peggy was gone!

* * * * * * *

Late that evening, after the curly head of Peggy Rompers had been fast asleep upon its pillow for several hours, the door of her little bedroom opened cautiously. It was Aunt Nan. A new Aunt Nan, for a curious happy light now filled her eyes as she tenderly gathered Peggy up in her arms. But there were tears in her eyes. Peggy was sure she saw them!

"Peggy," cried her Aunt Nan, "Peggy, child!" Peggy Rompers was sure she saw the real tears in her Aunt Nan's eyes this time.

"Peggy, dear, you little rogue!" she laughed between the sobs that seemed to choke her voice. "You have made your Aunt Nan very, very happy. Oh, so happy, darling!"

Peggy only nestled closer in her Aunt Nan's arms. Her little tousled blonde head rested against Aunt Nan's heart.

"You've been naughty, dear, I know," Aunt Nan continued, pressing the warm little body closer to her own, "but you have made me very happy, darling!"

"Aunt Nan," questioned the little girl, demurely, "will you make me very, very happy, dear?"

Aunt Nan only drew the little form closer to her own.

Peggy continued: "Janey Smith's Uncle Ben, he wants to 'dopt me, but I'd much rather be 'dopted by you, Aunt Nan! I'd much rather have a Muvver, a real Muvver, than a Father!" placing her chubby little arms about Nancy Emerson's neck. Aunt Nan's unrestrained tears now ran down over the little blonde head of Peggy, and she did not try to hide them. "You will 'dopt me, Aunt Nan?" begged the child.

"Darling Peggy," exclaimed her aunt, "nothing would make me happier than to have you for my very, very own!"

"Oh, Aunt Nan," exclaimed the child, clapping her chubby little hands, "then we will let Janey Smith's Uncle Ben 'dopt Bobby! Then," she added, "Bobby will have a Father, and I will have a Muvver, all our very own!"

"You will both have a Father and a Mother, darling," whispered Aunt Nan, "all your very own!"

A Little Blue Will Do

By Yetta Kay Stoddard

"I'LL marry you right away," announced old Freeman Zenas, the evening of his friend's funeral.

Marta smiled a little without speaking.

Yet in spite of Freeman's fine offer two days after Professor Frost died, his young daughter Marta went to work; a natural sequence, for, leaving out the consideration of her rich elderly suitor and his set plans, she saw no other way of gaining the money required for the bread, shoes, sense of liberation and other necessities of her body and soul. Those many, many other things that had been denied her youth! Color and light, they were; and dreams of laughing happiness. And love.

"I'll marry you right away," Freeman had repeated. "You can stay right on here with Old Matty until you get things the way you want them, and then we can either live to my house and put up this one for sale, or I'll get rid of my big place and come here. This shack's good enough. And we can let old Matty go. You won't need her as long as I keep my health and I'm feeling pretty purt just the same as usual."

Marta still smiled. Freeman sprawled in her father's chair, awaiting her comment; but the minutes passed unpunctuated except by the man's furtive glances at the girl, who sat seeming to watch the harbor lights with the same eagerness he had noted that night when first ten years ago Old Matty brought the sick professor and little Marta to this brown bungalito on the hillside.

Of that first night here at this south window Marta was indeed thinking. She remembered her loneliness back in that time; though it was nothing in comparison to this new strange loneliness without Daddy. Suddenly there had been a boy's voice speaking.

"What do they signal to you—the channel lamps?"

"I don't know——" she had answered, marveling at finding speech so readily. Mr. Zenas and her father were at the other end of the room. They had not heard. She went on, half whispering:

"A wonder story. I can't say the words of it but I almost can. Can you?"

"Yes. Pio Pico says—very slow: 'Wait, watch. Watch, wait.' Ballast Point says, 'Hurry!' Number Three ticks off, 'Safe, safe, safe.' Altogether, it's 'Good night. All's right. 'Till morning light.'"

She had never talked with Arthur Geoffrion again. Too busy sorting out, marking and putting away her father's papers, searching them out again, and again putting them away; ministering to his comfort, attending him at every turn for the worse; she had grown up companionless. She did not look for Arthur to return again; but the memory of his voice and presence at the window that one evening lingered. She idealized it, taking out of it such joy as she might have had were she ninety instead of nineteen.

Nineteen? She looked, acted, felt at least thirty this sad beautiful evening with Daddy gone; this ugly hour with old Freeman so persistent.

"Well, good night, Marty. I see you don't feel much on the talk. We'll fix it up tomorrer or the next day. No hurry, only you don't want to stay here alone for long."

"Good night," said the girl, dreamily, still smiling. "All's right. Till morning light."

Taking her vague words for an invitation to call next morning, Freeman was on hand before Marta and Old Matty had cleared away their breakfast dishes. The girl's face turned white as he entered. Unreasoning fear that he had come to marry her now seized her; with it a nightmare terror of uncertainty as to where her duty lay; followed by a panic of plunging, tearing, desperate attempt to extricate herself from the trap her dear foolish-wise father and Freeman had laid for her. She sat holding upside down the Want Ad section of the Atchester Star; the fine print fascinating her. Trying to spell out the reversed words, she found herself repeating:

Wanted: Reliable young woman with brains, to handle filing system. Apply in person today. Threnno Steamship Line, 42 Lower Main Street.

And immediately she was freed from all uncertainty, fear, and weakness; she knew what she was going to do and how to go about it.

"Excuse me, Mr. Zenas," she said, rising and going towards the door. "I've something to do in town today that will not wait."

"I'll drive you in," proffered her lover. "Hi-Stepper'd like nothing better. Been shut up ten days back taking in oats by the keg and barrelful."

"Not today. No, thanks. Please. It will take too long and I may not be back tonight."

"Not back tonight! You, a young girl, stay in the city over night? What you thinking of? Where'd you put up at?"

"There's a hotel I know of. Several. And I've five dollars. Excuse me—you know, we're not married let, and I'm of age. I must hurry. Good by, Matty!"

She breathed normally only when she had stepped aboard the in-town Arleigh Heights car and had seated herself beside Arthur Geoffrion. She felt sure it was he. The young man made room for her without giving her so much as a glance. Perhaps he had long since forgotten the existence of Marta Frost. Yet she drew comfort from his presence during that forty-minute ride. It was as if she had run from old Freeman's arms into his! She laughed at the boldness of her thought, finding a strange happiness in it. Not strange either; for Arthur was young like herself. Unhampered, he made his own decisions; did as he pleased; was normal! His skin was red and scrubbed-looking, and he grinned upon life unafraid. He was grinning determinedly now, thinking out some problem, likely.

Marta braced up. She would be normal herself. She, too, would learn to grin.

"I'll get that job," she was promising herself. "I'll get it if there are forty other applicants! I'm reliable, am I not? I am. I've got brains, haven't I? A few, I believe. I can file papers, can't I? Yes, sir, so that they can be found afterwards, too! Oh, I'll show Threnno Steamship Line how to know where things are and keep them there. I'll camp on that blessed job. And I won't have to look at Freeman's nose-wart except on Sundays—maybe not then. Oh, never, I hope, never!"

With the new job in her pocket Marta came home that night to a sympathetic Old Matty. She was to report next morning and everybody seemed just crazy to have her get there and get to work. When Freeman called for his answer, she fenced.

"Not just now, Mr. Zenas. I'm going to work for a while. There are debts, you know. And I want a change—I've been shut in so long—it seems as if I were just born——"

"Just born a fool idiot!" thundered Freeman and banged his way out of the room. Marta was shaking with laughter when he presently stuck his crooked face in and said:

"When you get sick and tired of working, Marty, I'll be ready just the same and I guess it won't be long to wait."

"Maybe not," laughed Marta.

"I won't put on black," Threnno's new filing clerk was telling her considering self. "It's a dingy office, anyway; and I'll be going in and out on the cars and taking my lunch and no one will notice what I have on. I'll wear out the drab mohair skirt and the gray serge coat. And my old mousie beaver hat. They're all whole yet, even. I do hate the sight of their ugliness. It'll be mourning enough to go on wearing them. New black! It would be positively giddy in me. I couldn't be so disrespectful to Daddy's memory."

So, from late summer on through the fall and winter mornings and evenings, a happy gray shadow named Marta Frost traveled back and forth on the Arleigh Heights cars. She usually chose the smoker end. It reminded her of Daddy. How man-empty the house on the hillside was without its old tobacco smells! On and off she got, morning and evening; and might have been a puff of smoke from their combined pipes, cigars and cigarettes, for all the notice the men she traveled with took of her. Not even Arthur Geoffrion saw her; and she had rather expected that some day, when he was not too preoccupied,

Ends Stubborn Coughs in a Hurry

For real effectiveness, this old home-made remedy has no equal. Easily and cheaply prepared.

You'll never know how quickly a bad cough can be conquered, until you try this famous old home-made remedy. Anyone who has coughed all day and all night will say that the immediate relief is given almost like magic. It is very easily prepared, and there is nothing better for coughs.

Into a pint bottle, put 2½ ounces of Pinex; then add plain granulated sugar syrup to make a full pint. Or you can use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, the full pint saves about two-thirds of the money usually spent for cough preparations, and gives you a more positive, effective remedy. It keeps perfectly, and tastes pleasant—children like it.

You can feel this take hold instantly, soothing and healing the membranes in all the air passages. It promptly loosens a dry, tight cough, and soon you will notice the phlegm thin out and disappear. A day's use will usually break up an ordinary throat or chest cold, and it is also splendid for bronchitis, croup, hoarseness, and bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a most valuable concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, the most reliable remedy for throat and chest ailments.

To avoid disappointment, ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with directions and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

A REMARKABLE BOOK FREE TO YOU...

We have made special arrangements with the publishers so you can read this remarkable book, "Thrown on the World," by Charlotte M. Braeme—possibly the most fascinating and thrilling love story ever written. It is the story of a young girl who has been cruelly deceived by a rich lord who deserts her to marry a lady of title.

"Heaven help her! There is no remedy either on earth or in heaven for such woe as hers. She read to the very end, and then sat still, staring, dumb, like one turned to stone. She did not scream, faint or weep; but the awful despair that came over her was terrible to see. The white lips were parted and open, but no sound came from them: the violet eyes had a wild, lost, bewildered expression; no trace, no outward expression of grief could have been so awful as this blank, silent, terrible despair.

The wind blew the falling leaves of the roses into the room, and then idly stirred the letter which lay at her feet; that aroused her as though some living thing had moved beside her. She rose from her seat.

"Ulric!" she cried, with a terrible voice, then rose, like one blind and dizzy, and went into the garden. She thought he was there; her brain reeled beneath the shock; there was nothing save the flowers and the trees, and she went back again, not knowing what she was about."

ill You Wear A Violet?

By Anna P. Bowen

VILL you wear a violet on Thursday, March the twenty-fourth? We all know that "Carnation Day" spells "Mother's Day," but do you recall what "Violet Day" commemorates —whose favorite flower it was? k in the year 1820, on a blustery March vee baby daughter came to the home of n Crosby, and she brought with her as a pair of eyes as nature ever provided, six weeks of age those tiny eyes were rever sightless by the error of a physi- ode of treatment for infection.

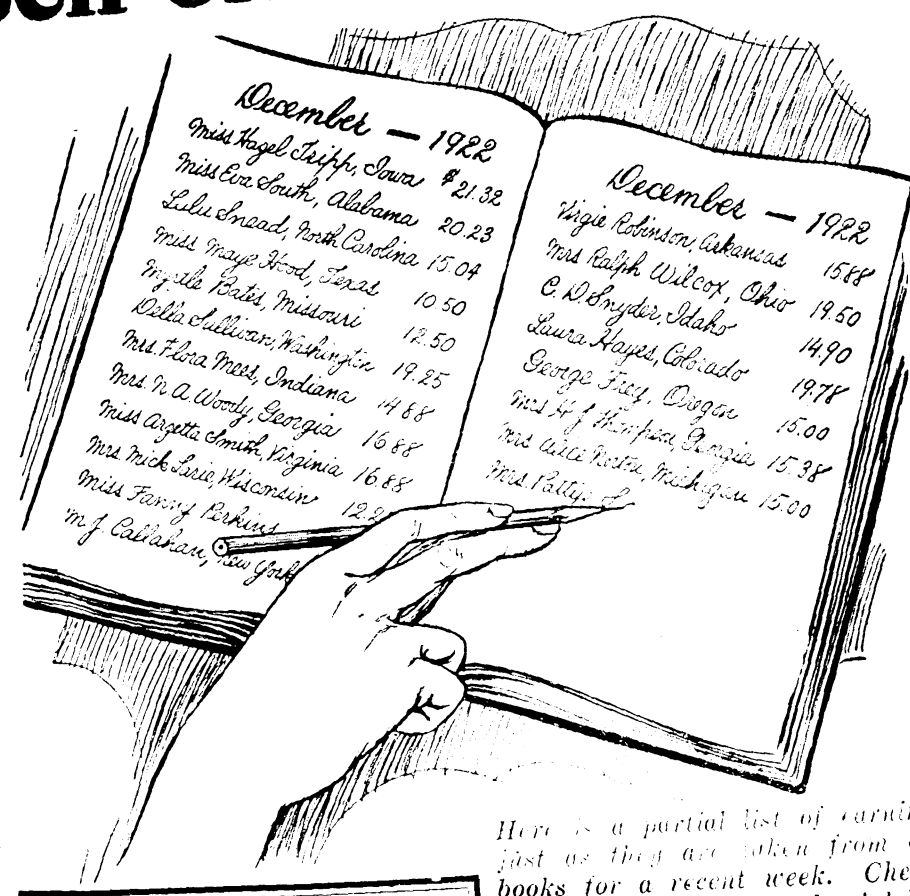
Put Yourself on Our Payroll



Doing Pleasant Work in Spare Time at Home

HERE'S the way to get substantial pay-checks regularly—extra money for yourself—earned without leaving the comfort or privacy of your own home.

Nothing to sell—no canvassing to do—no boss standing over you—no time-clock to punch! Yet a way that will reward you well for every spare hour you wish to work.

Think of being on the payroll and receiving pay-checks at a regular guaranteed wage rate without keeping office or factory hours—without "going out to work"—checks for socks that you will enjoy knitting right at home in spare time!

Thousands of women—and men, too—have literally jumped at this great opportunity to turn spare moments into quick cash. A New York woman has earned nearly $100.00 per month for two years—a Wisconsin man and his wife have bought a new car—a Pennsylvania woman helped her husband buy a home—thousands of dreams have come true through the aid of money made at home in this pleasant way!

Here is a partial list of earnings just as they are taken from our books for a recent week. Checks mailed for that week totalled $3176.76. Why should not you, too, earn some of this money in your spare time at home?

Thousands of women are today turning their spare time into real dollars right in the privacy and comfort of their own homes.

The work is pleasant and dignified and the earnings depend upon each individual's skill and industry.

No selling or canvassing required. Neither weather nor seasons affect you—you can earn money all the year round —in whatever leisure time you have.

Find out all about this interesting proposition by mailing the coupon below. No obligation.

The Work Is Pleasant

There's nothing difficult—nothing mysterious about the work these people are doing. It is called Auto Knitting—and is simply making Olde Tyme Wool Socks on the Auto Knitter, a remarkable little machine which bears the same relation to hand-knitting that the sewing machine does to hand sewing.

With the aid of the Auto Knitter the woman in the home quickly turns out fine wool socks of beautiful texture and excellent quality for which we pay her a fixed wage rate besides furnishing replacement yarn for further work.

To use the Auto Knitter is really pleasant work and a welcome relief from household duties. A person of average intelligence can operate the machine by following the instructions given in the complete instruction book which explains everything clearly and simply and shows just how to do the work.

Turns "Home-Hours" into "Money-Hours"

This is just the thing for those who want to work at home. For the woman with a household to look after, for the mother with children to care for, for anyone who has spare hours that they would like to turn into real cash!

An hour before noon perhaps after the morning tasks are done, a couple of hours in the afternoon before the children come home from school. An hour or so in the evening—and lo! the hours that you used to waste are converted into welcome dollars to add to the family bank account.

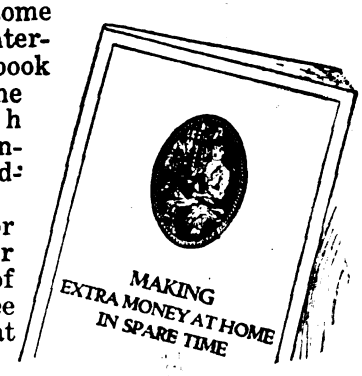
New clothes—a new hat—new things for the children—new furniture for the home—you can now earn these things through the right use of the spare time you now really waste!—others are doing it—so can you. The free book tells how.

Build Up a Business of Your Own

Perhaps you'd like to start a permanent and profitable business of your own. Auto Knitting affords you a splendid opportunity to do so. You can not only knit for us under our wage agreement but can build up an excellent home trade knitting socks and other knitted things for friends and neighbors.

You Too Can Earn Extra Money at Home!

Of course you want more money —we all do. Wouldn't it be wonderful if you could have even a few more dollars each week—for prettier clothes—an occasional good time—some longed-for luxury?



Why should you not earn money in the comfort and privacy of your home—just as thousands of other people are doing.

Last year Auto Knitter workers earned over $120,000 in wages. They made and sent to us over a million pairs of Olde Tyme Wool Socks.

This shows the work which the Auto Knitter is capable of doing in the hands of the workers—shows you the fairness of the company, and indicates with what assurance of success you can take up the work.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

A GIRL from Missouri, one of you, sends me the following "rules of conduct for women and girls" as given her by her mother, and asks me to have them printed for the benefit of every girl who reads this column. They are worthwhile.

Remember that modesty is a woman's greatest charm.

Remember that men will encourage you to do all the bold and immodest things that you are silly enough to do and then despise you for it.

Remember that any man that is half a man will protect you from another man, but you must protect yourself from him.

BOB FITZ, Virginia.—Bob, you are a dear, and I predict a successful future for you. The kindly spirit and consideration that prompted you to write such a good letter to me, a maiden lady of uncertain age, is sure to win friends for you. I shall keep your letter, not forever, but until my filing cabinet gets filled up again, but the memory of it will remain with me always. Thank you, Bob.

I. F., Virginia.—There's nothing you can do but write and explain why you were so negligent, just as you did to me. He should understand. (2) You are rather young for boy company, one particular boy, but your father should be willing for you to have several of your young friends in at one time, not necessarily couples, for an evening of music or games. Get Father interested in whatever you are doing; it's surprising what good scouts fathers can be if you give them a chance.

HEART-BROKEN GIRL, Virginia.—Don't be so sure that you "have done found" the right one. You may think he is the right one for you but if he thought you were the right one for him he would want to see you more often. It doesn't matter if he did say he'd "die without you." That listens well but doesn't mean anything. Don't take any boy seriously for years and years but do regard your spelling with a little more seriousness. It pains me deeply to have you take such liberties with it.

BROKEN-HEARTED GIRL, Illinois.—You have no reason for thinking yourself broken hearted. Instead you should be bubbling over with happiness because you learned in time what a mean creature he was. I can't tell you what I really think of him for it wouldn't look nice in print. Don't write to him and don't take him back.

BROWN EYES, Oklahoma.—Don't feel badly because you don't make friends more easily. You are young and there is plenty of time for that later on. Your studies should take up most of your time and attention now. Learn how to talk and what to talk about and then let the other fellow do most of the talking. (2) Read Katharine Booth's instructions for reducing exercises.

A PUZZLED GIRL, Penn.—Tell your friend, frankly, that your grandmother objects to you having boy friends. It is better to do that than have him think you object to him personally. Make him understand your feeling of gratitude toward her for the care she has given you since the death of your parents. I'm a firm believer in tact and diplomacy (though not gifted with either), and armed with these two mighty weapons he should be able to conquer her objections.

FAIRTIME GIRL, Penn.—See answer to Puzzled Girl.

BROWNIE.—At sixteen you are too young to correspond with boys, and much too young to think of leaving school and getting married. His parents may be "nice people" and all that, but that doesn't signify they'd be nice in-laws if you had to live with them. There's something about being an in-law that ruins a person's disposition, though I've met hundreds that were perfectly lovely. Let him stop drinking and make a home for you, if he really cares.

MARIE, Michigan.—You've brought up a question that other girls have asked and which I've rathed hesitated to answer. In your case it automatically takes care of itself for you are too young to have a steady beau or a once-in-a-while either. I'm speaking of the girl old enough to have a beau or beaux (isn't that a crazy plural?) Should she go to dances and parties with one fellow all the time or with several? If she does the latter she is likely to be called a flirt, or worse, by gossipy neighbors—and the best of neighbors love to gossip—and if she goes with only one fellow, first thing she knows he has gotten to be a habit and they are married. Propinquity is a terrible thing—I'd rather have measles any day—and responsible for more marriages than anything else. The only safe way is to steer a steady course between the Scylla of once-in-awhiles and the Charybdis of a steady. In other words, she who loves and runs away will live to love another day.

E., Virginia.—I don't blame him for not coming back to you. If he is a sensible young man he will reason that the girl who would expect him to leave his store the Saturday before Christmas, would be a poor sort for a wife. Sentiment is one thing, and you didn't display much common sense. Write to him and tell him you are sorry you were so unreasonable and tell him that you are trying to get your troublesome temper under control. Do it, too, else it will get you into serious trouble sometime.

BROWN EYES, Alabama.—Why marry a cousin, even a third cousin? It's so confusing. Your children would be fourth cousins to you and your husband and their children would be fifth cousins as well as grandchildren and their children would be—but it's getting too complicated. You'd be so mixed up you wouldn't know where you were at. Besides, I don't believe it is right from a eugenic standpoint. Thank goodness I don't like any of my cousins well enough to marry any of them. That's one thing I don't have to worry about.

E. O., N. D.—I'd rather not advise you, really advise you, but am willing to talk it over with you. I'm not blaming you for falling in love with him—those things just happen—but do ask you to consider well his wife's side of it. She isn't here to defend herself so I'll present her case. Even if their marriage was a boy-and-girl affair with perhaps little sentiment on his part, the fact remains that she has given the best years of her life to him, "best" in a matrimonial sense, for her chances of a second marriage, at probably thirty with a child, are much less than yours, for instance. If it hadn't been for him she might have married a better man or gone into work for herself that would have developed a stand-alone spirit in her, whereas, marriage has a weakening effect upon women, not weakening exactly, but tends to make them less self reliant perhaps. It is only natural that a woman should grow that way after years of being cared for. If she is that type and a home and husband mean everything to her, as it should to every woman, have you thought of her feelings when she is left alone? Even a liberal settlement and support of the child won't make up for the loss of a husband to the woman who has grown accustomed to one. You can't tell how the plumbers tracked up the house to a monthly check or show it your new dress or make a cake for it. These are trifling things but they fill the lives of many women and if she is that kind her life is going to be more or less messed up if you take her husband away from her. Does she love him—and are you sure you love him? We are so likely to think we want what we can't have, when if we could have it we wouldn't want it. Don't act hastily, and I hope you will do what is best for all concerned. Shall be interested in your decision if you care to write again.

JEALOUS, Geogria.—If it came to a showdown between hurting your feelings or the feelings of the girl who chases him, it seems that you should be considered first. If he doesn't want to talk with her he doesn't have to. You are easy to give up other boys because he doesn't like it. I don't see that he does so much giving up himself. If he postpones your wedding again, for the third time, tell him you think it had better be postponed for 99 years. It might be well if you did the postponing yourself, before he has a chance to, and get a more reliable sweetheart.

BRIGHT EYES, Detroit.—The answer to Jealous of Georgia applies to your case. You can't make me believe that a man can't get out of taking a girl out if he wants to. It would be an easy matter to have an excuse of some sort ready if he knew she was likely to ask him to take her somewhere. He may be "very mannerly" but I don't thnk he is showing much respect for you by taking a girl of questionable reputation around with him. Tell him you have no intentions of competing with any girl for the affections of a man, and particularly of a girl of her class, and that if she wants him she can have him so far as you are concerned, if he hasn't enough to him to resist. Are you sure he wants to?

ROSEBUD, Illinois.—Have sent your letter to the Family Doctor. Read his column and the Beauty Department for answers to such queries as yours.

HAPPY KID, Virginia.—Atta girl, that's the way to sign yourself, and not "Heartbroken" or something equally doleful, just because your sweetie talks to some other girl. You've got the right idea. Let him have her if he wants her. There's plenty more men.

UNCERTAIN, Penn.—Don't ask me if it is all right to marry a "froeigner" and then neglect to tell me of what nationality he is and all about him. All that has to be considered, but think you had better obey your parents. They know the facts of the case and their advice is worth more than mine.

SHORTY, Wisconsin.—How do you know he doesn't go to dances with other girls when he is away from you? Remember, Shorty, a man in your arms (figuratively speaking, of course) is worth two on the road. He has no right to ask you to give up all others when you are not even engaged to him. You have no assurance that he ever means to be, so why should you pass up men who might have serious intentions?

G'by, girls. COUSIN MARION.

A Little Blue Will Do

he would remember that first night with the harbor lights and would speak to her about—about what?

It was her clothes, of course, that rendered her invisible to him and the rest of them. Arthur never missed Mrs. Trippett's flashing in and flapping out. Elsa Gans he could see three blocks off. They wore style, they did. Yet neither could hold a candle to Marta for intrinsic good looks. The waved smoothness of her brown hair, the old shapeless mouse-colored beaver concealed from Arthur's beauty-worshiping eyes; and he was defrauded by the hideous gray serge coat of the splendid line from throat to shoulder, the graceful knitting of hand to wrist. Many a noble lady would have envied Marta that point. The vicious flaring mohair skirt conspired with both hat and coat to keep everyone in ignorance of the dear girl's every charm. Even her office mates, admire her work as they might, simply could not see her, the person she was, herself.

And Marta proved up. She proved reliability, brains and apple-pie order systemization of the Threnno Steamship Line's addled papers. Her salary rose. She paid debts. She grew ambitious and began the study of shop windows.

One evening she brought home a pair of lovely blue silk stockings, and hid them at the bottom of a bureau drawer as fast as she could get to it.

"What would I do, wearing them?" she argued. "I haven't anything else that's blue and haven't had since I was ten years old.

However, the knowledge that she owned the stockings wrought a change in Marta. She began the accumulation of blue things. A shiny black straw hat with blue rosebuds came home and was tucked away out of sight. A blue silk petticoat lay folded beside the stockings. One day she saw a pair of fashionable boots with blue tops. Extravagance! In went Marta and laid down fourteen hard-earned dollars for them; afterwards to sneak past Old Matty and bury them with her other prideful possessions. Blue silk gloves ended the first series of her wild buyings.

Weeks passed when she brought home nothing more startling than a handkerchief, a lace collar or a hair net. It seemed to Marta that she had no notion of ever wearing her pretty blue things. She had them. That was enough. Where would she wear them, anyway? There was no one interested in what she wore except Old Matty and Zenas; and Zenas she was not yet ready to attract again to her side. Neither had she any purpose in view for her saved-up pennies, until, all at once, she knew! A little suit exactly matching the blue of her cached hat and gloves, boots and stockings, hung in a certain display window where she passed. It might have been labeled, that suit:

I BELONG TO MARTA FROST

for the price mark corresponded to a cent with the amount that Marta had tied into the corner of an old veil in her purse; and it fitted her figure as though she had been measured for its making.

Such excitement raged in her adventurous heart! What would Old Matty say? When in the world would she dare to wear such garments? With her guilt written upon her flushed face, she climbed the little hill towards home. Her servant flung the door wide, exclaiming, at sight of the oblong box:

"You've bought yourself a new dress!"

"Yes, so I have, Matty," admitted Marta, feebly.

"And it's about time. All these years growing prettier every day you've lived and wearing out your ma's old things and doing without and without till you're most a disgrace to me—and I'm not a gay dresser, either," scolded hearty Old Matty.

Marta threw her arms, box and all, around the woman's broad shoulders; and there ensued a good laugh and a better cry together; as is the established custom of women who live much alone and grow through tenderness to understand each other's inmost needs.

Next morning Marta started out, dressed in her customary grayness.

"Not going to wear your pretties?" questioned Old Matty in a disappointed tone. She had seen them all displayed on Marta's bed the night before.

"I don't care," laughed Marta, hurrying off; a little late, she feared, to catch the eight-ten intown car.

That day she was seated with Arthur Geoffrion once more. As the moments passed, with Mrs. Trippett in green-and-violet flashing in at Dexter Street and flapping out at Bolingstoke Way; with Elsa Gans in violent orange sports togs running down the aisle to hold Arthur's hand too long, too long, Marta thought; a growing sense of her loneliness filled the young girl's heart. Why couldn't Arthur remember her? There were actually tears in her eyes when, without the least notice of her, he crowded past, to swing out of the car at Michigan and First.

"I ought to be ashamed!" she declared to herself, when she realized the mood she had fallen into. "Why, here I am, well and strong, with a good, good job, and still free. Old Zenas has about given up hope by this time, I hope! There's something wrong with me if I can't be happy——"

That was a rainy, splashy, drenching, dreary day in late May. Marta's good faithful old grays saw their last usefulness during the fifteen minutes that it took her to struggle from the car up to the shelter of Old Matty's arms and the front door at home that evening. The shapeless hour was a complete wreck. Neither coat nor skirt could be worn again without a protracted stay at the tailors.

"Thank goodness," breathed Old Matty, as she flung the dripping garments aside. "You'll wear your blue things tomorrow?"

"I'll wear my blue things tomorrow and the next day; and when I feel like it I'll buy some others." Marta spoke recklessly.

The sun was out. The sky was doing its best to match her eyes when the blue loveliness of Marta Frost floated in upon Arthur Geoffrion's inner vision the next morning. He arose from his seat, raising his hat. Too late he was, for three other men acted likewise simultaneously and Marta was already smiling radiant thanks upon one of them. She had become visible to the whole car. Arthur could not take his eyes off her. He refused to be prevented from paying tribute to her glory.

"Miss Frost?" he asked, coming across the aisle to her. Martha bowed. He had remembered then?

"Your father was Professor Frost?" Again she bowed.

"Don't you recall?" he pleaded. "The night you and your father came to the little brown house? I was there, under your window. You understood about the harbor lights, the way I understood."

"I remember," laughed Marta, catching the little throb of pain in her voice and changing it to joy, before he could notice her emotion.

"You've been away?" he asked next.

"No. Right here. All the time. Have you?"

"No. We moved to Amburyton soon after. I've only been back in the old town since last August."

"Father died in August," explained Marta.

At this place in their odd conversation Mrs. Trippett and Elsa Gans boarded the car together. From Arthur they got no more than a perfunctory nod.

"How beautiful!" murmured Marta.

"They? Their clothes?" Arthur asked. "Too snappy. Tasteless. Blue's my color—the shade you're wearing. It's your—the sky's shade exactly."

* * * * * * *

Marta sat at the open window that night. The day had been perfectly summery and the evening warm. She felt lonelier than ever she had before felt; and she was remembering old-loneliness and thinking of loneliness to come, when she would be Mrs. Freeman Zenas, shut in again——

Suddenly a boy's voice:

"What do they signal to you—the channel lamps?"

"I don't know—a wonder story. 'Safe, safe, safe,' " she repeated.

Marta's ancient suitor, poking his head unceremoniously into the dim room, heard the girl's low laughter and Arthur Geoffrion's low chuckle.

"So she's chosen elsewhere," he acknowledged and generously, silently withdrew.
